Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word. The gentleman is recognized for five minntes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for these five minutes for the purpose of getting some information, if I may, from the chairman of the committee. We are told that this bill comes with the unanimous report of the Committee on Agriculture; at least it comes with the acquiescence of the members of the Committee on Agriculture to the extent and in the sense that there has been no minority report filed, and perhaps there was no adverse vote cast in the committee. We are also informed that recently the committee has been importuned to make changes in the bill, to offer amendments to I would like to ask at this time, at the beginning of the consideration of the bill under the 5-minute rule, whether it is the purpose of the committee to offer any amendments to the bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is not the purpose to offer any amendments to the bill. I will say to the gentleman that the committee has given consideration to the subject for years, and the result is that the bill, as it is, represents the best efforts of the committee. A number of amendments were suggested, but on close examination I think you will find all of them provided for in the bill, with very few exceptions, which did not seem to be of much importance, as, for instance, that the word "cooperative" be inserted in connection with associations. I think any fair-minded man will agree that the word "associations" as used means cooperative associations as well as others.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman mean that cooperative associations are covered when the word "person" is used?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes. The committee believes it is covered by "associations," whether they are cooperative or not.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That involves no change of intent on the part of the committee?

Mr. HAUGEN. None whatever.

Mr. CHINDBLOM, Mr. Chairman, I presume it would be useless at this time or in the further consideration of this bill to make any further comment on the policy on which we are embarking, of trying to regulate and control private business. The vote on the recent bill which passed here to regulate and control the business of the boards of trade and the grain exchanges in the country showed the temper and the attitude of the House. There are already indications that the farmers who were intended to be benefited by the board of trade bill are beginning to object to such legislation. In my own State of Illinois farmers appeared in large numbers at the State Capitol, before the legislature and before its committees, objecting to that kind of legislation, because they begin to see that it is going to injure rather than benefit their interests, and I apprehend the same result will come from this legislation.

It has been said that the packers do not object to this bill. That is probably because they have reached the conclusion that it is useless to object to the system upon which Congress seems determined to embark. But I believe time will prove the lack of wisdom in our trying to regulate and control private business.

If we are going to be consistent, Mr. Chairman, I presume we will seek to control the coal business, the lumber business, and the other large basic industries; and if our true purpose is, as has been stated on the floor of the House, to reduce the high cost of living, I suggest that we begin by passing a bill to control and regulate the retail grocery business of the country.

During the war we necessarily embarked upon this kind of a system. It became necessary that the Government, in the conduct of the war, should control the industries of the Nation. Nobody found fault with that. But the time has come, I think, when we ought soberly, quietly, and consistently to consider whether we should continue and enlarge and perpetuate the systems which we established during the war purely for the purposes of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I ask for five minutes more.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It happens that I come from the State and the city where the largest packing industries are located, and also where the largest board of trade or grain exchange is located. I hold no brief for those interests. I have never represented them in any way. I do not represent them at this time. I am not speaking at their request or upon their suggestion; but I believe that Congress should pause for a moment and seriously consider whether it is wise to continue this practice of adopting these regulatory measures time after time.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Yes. Mr. CHINDBLOM.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does not the gentleman think there is a great deal of difference between a business that has virtually become a monopoly and other business interests, as far as regulation is concerned?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If a business is a monopoly or if a business is conducted in an improper and illegal manner, we have plenty of legislation upon the books now under which that kind of abuse can be reached. There is plenty of law in the country for that purpose to-day.

Mr. LAYTON. Too much. Mr. CHINDBLOM. The c Mr. CHINDBLOM. The country is suffering from too much legislation. The legislatures of the States, the Congress of the United States, the city councils, and boards of aldermen in the cities, all of them, have launched upon this program of regulating business and of attempting to determine how private business shall be operated and managed by the citizens of the country. I purposely asked the chairman of the committee whether it is proposed to recommend any amendments to this bill on the part of the committee. If this bill is not seriously amended during the course of its consideration under the fiveminute rule, it may be possible for the packers to operate under it. If the claim should be made that they have approved this legislation, I believe it can be truthfully said that that is not the exact situation with regard to them. As I said a moment ago, they may have reached the conclusion, which, I think, the Members of the House have reached, that we are going to pass some kind of regulatory legislation for the packers; and if that is the situation, perhaps it is useless for those of us who do not believe in that kind of legislation to offer objections. I merely wanted to say at the outset of this discussion that it must not be assumed that the lack of opposition to this bill means that all of the Members of this House and that the people of the country represented by the Members of this House are in general accord with this system of regulatory legislation for the conduct of private business.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 202. It shall be unlawful for any packer to:

(a) Engage in or use any unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive practice or device in commerce; or

(b) Make or give, in commerce, any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person or locality in any respect whatsoever, or subject, in commerce, any particular person or locality to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever; or

(c) Sell or otherwise transfer to or for any other packer, or buy or otherwise receive from or for any other packer, any article for the purpose or with the effect of apportioning the supply in commerce between any such packers, if such apportionment has the tendency or effect of restraining commerce or of creating a monopoly in commerce; or

(d) Sell or otherwise transfer to or for any other person, or buy or otherwise receive from or for any other person, any article for the purpose or with the effect of manipulating or controlling prices in commerce, or of creating a monopoly in the acquisition of, buying, selling, or dealing in, any article in commerce, or of restraining commerce; or

(e) Engage in any course of business or do any act for the purpose or with the effect of manipulating or controlling prices in commerce, or of creating a monopoly in the acquisition of, buying, selling, or dealing in, any article in commerce, or of restraining commerce; or

(f) Conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person (1) to apportion territory for carrying on business in commerce, or (2) to manipulate or control prices in commerce; or

(g) Conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person to do, or aid or abet the doing of, any act made unlawful by subdivision (a), (b), (c), (d), or (e).

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Jones of Texas: Page 5, line 25, after the word "commerce," where it occurs the second time, insert the following: "and it shall also be unlawful for any packer, or any broker, buyer, or commission man to notify any packer, broker, buyer, or commission man at another market to which any live stock may be reconsigned of the price bid on such stock at any point where the same has been theretofore offered for sale.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this is in no sense a committee amendment. It is an amendment which I am offering personally, and I want to make it clear, so that the House will understand that it is not a committee amendment. However, I think it is important. While I am not quite certain that the same powers could not be exercised under the provisions of the bill, it is so important that I do not think there should be any question about it. What I am undertaking to get at is this: It was shown by the hearings last year, and also shown by the hearings this year, that these buyers and packers have established a custom, where a man ships cattle, for instance, to Kansas City and finds the market congested and decides that he wants to ship them on to St. Louis or Chicago, of notifying the buyers of the big packers at St. Louis and Chicago of the amount bid on that shipment of cattle. I have had in my section of the country many, many complaints from cattlemen that they would find when they took a trainload or a few cars or a certain specified number of cattle to the market at Kansas City—perhaps cattle would be quoted when they started at $8 a hundred—they would find that congestion had come and cattle were down to $6 a hundred at Kansas City. reconsign them to St. Louis, and there they would be met by the combined agreements seemingly on the part of all buyers that they would bid no more than $6 at St. Louis and Chicago. The hearings last year disclosed that the packers did that and that they attempted to justify it. I claim it can not be justified in any sense whatever.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of Texas.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think it is necessary for anybody to notify anyone else who wants to buy anything not to pay any more for it than he ought to pay? I do not think that is necessary. They will be able to find it out for themselves.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I know, but if you put it in as one of the things that they are forbidden to do you will find that you may be able to get somewhere when you get the data properly before the Secretary of Agriculture. Now listen. It is all right for a man to go in and bid just what he wants to bid in the market of St. Louis or Chicago, but the so-called five big packers control 80 per cent or more of the meat that is put into interstate commerce. If these men get together and agree that they will bid no more on a man's cattle when he gets to the market to which they are reconsigned than was bid at the original market, they could force a man to sell at almost any price they pleased.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.

Mr. FESS. I want to ask the gentleman a practical question that comes to my mind. Suppose a broker has a branch office at each one of these cities, does the gentleman mean that their branch office could not communicate to the main office what they had bid on a load of cattle?

Mr. JONES of Texas. No; not conveying information from this market point to that market point what a man bid on a particular shipment of cattle, but they go down and see the bill of lading and immediately notify the buyers at St. Louis of the amount they bid on these cattle, and no matter what the market is they will not bid more than was bid in Kansas City.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman's amendment would not prevent the information from being sent from one branch of the house to another branch or the main house.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose pro forma the amendment, although I am in favor of the result sought by Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the amendment, and not in a pro forma way.

Mr. BLANTON. The principle of the amendment I am in favor of, but not in the way it is drawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas afterwards.

Mr. BLANTON. There will be time enough for both of us. am in hearty accord with what my colleague is seeking to do, but, say, my colleague's cattle reaches the Kansas City marand the next morning the published Reporter for that market comes out with the statement that Marvin Jones, of Amarillo, Tex., had five cars of steers on the Kansas City market on which there was a bid of so much and that the steers were not sold but shipped on to Chicago or to St. Louis. report reaches all the packers in Chicago and St. Louis before the cattle do, and the packers, without one single word of advice, without having received one word of special notification from the Kansas City market know immediately the bid that has been made on those cattle. They do not have to be notified. Cattlemen generally read the Market Reporter and have this information. What my colleague wants to do is to stop this combining that has been going on in fixing the price that is

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think the bill does that, too.

Mr. BLANTON. This amendment preventing the notification being sent to St. Louis or Chicago would not stop the combining, because they know from other sources.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I can give the gentleman an actual Two men shipped cattle to Kansas City, and after illustration. receiving bids, one reconsigned to St. Louis and the other went The man who reconsigned his cattle to St. Louis to Chicago received a bid of exactly what he received at Kansas City, but the man who reconsigned to Chicago got a higher price.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, the one at Chicago did not happen to have enough cattle to let the reporter make a note of it. All shipments of any size are mentioned in the Stockyard Reporter. They do not have to wait for the Reporter to come by mail because they have its contents by wire. They do not have to send out individual notifications; they know it all. I am with my colleague in what he proposes to do, but he is only going so far and not far enough. What he wants to do is to stop them from combining and fixing prices.

Will the gentleman yield? Mr. JACOWAY.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. JACOWAY. Does not the gentleman think that the provisions in the bill are sufficient for that purpose?

Mr. BLANTON. Some of them are. The bill has some very good provisions in it and some very bad features. In this committee is the proper time and place to see to it that this measure is properly framed to stop combinations and price fixing.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. As near as I can gather, the mischief that the gentleman seeks to cure or find a remedy for is that by wire in the old-fashioned way or through the air it shall be unlawful to give any information as to what price was bid at Kansas City.

Mr. BLANTON. You can not stop the information. Cattlemen themselves each day seek it. It is the combinations that you can stop and that ought to be stopped. It is the conspiracy against the raisers of stock on the part of the stockyards and packers that we are trying to remedy.

Mr. CANNON. You are not going to have any agreement as to what the price shall be?

Mr. BLANTON. That is what ought to be done away with by this bill, and then it would be possible to stop these combine agreements against producers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, as stated by the proposer of this amendment, this matter was considered fully by the committee. There has been practically in the past, not at present, what they call "wiring on." I do not think this Congress can pass a law to say to a branch house or the company in Kansas City that they can not notify the other house of what they bid on any specific lot of cattle. I do not think that was the evil complained of. The evil was that when that information was conveyed to Chicago it was used for the purpose of holding the price of that particular lot of cattle down so that a man could not profit by forwarding his shipment there. The language used by the gentleman's amendment, in my judgment, will weaken this bill. In the first place, I do not think we have any right to pass a law, and I do not think we want to be put in the attitude before the country of seeking to pass a law that says to a man you can not communicate to your officers what you bid on a particular lot of cattle. By the unanimous consent of the committee we agreed that we would cover the proposition in a legal way. Now, I want to read you the language we used when we specified the things that they shall Engage in any course of business or do any act for the purpose or with the effect of manipulating or controlling prices in commerce or of creating a monopoly in the acquisition of buying, selling, or dealing in any article of commerce or of restraining commerce.

Now, to say that a man can not send to the stockyard what he bid on a lot of cattle, to his own house, state what he bid for that load of cattle, I do not think would be a good law or a constitutional law. But the law does say that the practice by which they manipulate the market must cease, and we give to the Secretary of Agriculture in the bill the power to enforce it. There are many places in the bill where many individuals would like to call the attention to existing evils by offering an amend-

Personally, I think the evil of wiring on under the old highly organized system among the packers was very bad, and I am glad that we have a bill that is going to stop it, but I do not think that we ought to weaken the bill by adding a provision to it that every man questions the legality of our right to do. I do not think we have any legal right to use the language that is in the amendment.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does not the gentleman think that under subsection (d) the Secretary of Agriculture probably would have that power as a general power?

Mr. TINCHER. Absolutely. He would have the power to enforce that rule if it had a tendency to or if it permitted a violation of this law, but I think we would simply weaken the bill if we adopted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Is it the gentleman's contention that the packers or any number of them control the price of cattle? Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes. They have in the past.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. In an organized way or as individ-

Mr. KINCHELOE. Oh, there are volumes covering a period of 30 years disclosing absolutely period after period when they have controlled the price of cattle. Every time you stop it one way, they find some new way to do it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCEER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Do the cattlemen, the men who raise the cattle or other products, have any organization by which they determine not to sell or ship?

Mr. TINCHER. Not that I ever heard of.

Mr. CANNON. I am just asking for information.

Mr. TINCHER. No; I think that organization would be impracticable. I am sure no such thing exists.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I think under the law we passed, giving them the right to organize for collective selling, they certainly would have the privilege of doing so, and I have been informed that in some lines, especially in wool, they are going to stop their sales in that way. I wondered if there was any such thing in connection with cattle.

Mr. TINCHER. No; I think not.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired. Did the Chair understand the gentleman from Iowa to insist upon the point of order?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the amendment is not germane to the bill. The bill deals with packers and stockyards, and the amendment as I heard it read seems to have no reference to transactions at stockyards. understood it to be in connection with transactions between individuals outside of stockyards. I do not think it is germane

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to pass on the point of The Chair thinks it is germane to the paragraph and to the bill and the point of order is overruled. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 203. (a) Whenever the Secretary has reason to believe that any packer has violated or is violating any provision of this title, he shall cause a complaint in writing to be served upon the packer, stating his charges in that respect, and requiring the packer to attend and testify at a hearing at a time and place designated therein, at least 30 days after the service of such complaint; and at such time and place there shall be afforded the packer a reasonable opportunity to be informed as to the evidence introduced against him (including the right of cross-examination), and to be heard in person or by counsel and through witnesses, under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe. Any person for good cause shown may on application be allowed by the Secretary to intervene in such proceeding, and appear in person or by counsel. At any time prior to the close of the hearing the Secretary may amend the complaint; but in case of any amendment adding new charges the hearing shall, on the request of the packer, be adjourned for a period not exceeding 15 days.

(b) If, after such hearing, the Secretary finds that the packer has violated or is violating any provisions of this title covered by the charges, he shall make a report in writing in which he shall state his findings as to the facts, and shall issue and cause to be served on the packer an order requiring such packer to cease and desist from continuing such violation. The testimony taken at the hearing shall be reduced to writing and filed in the records of the Department of Agriculture.

(c) Until a transcript of the record in such hearing has been filed culture.

(c) Until a transcript of the record in such hearing has been filed in a circuit court of appeals of the United States, as provided in section 204, the Secretary at any time, upon such notice and in such manner as he deems proper, but only after reasonable opportunity to the packer to be heard, may amend or set aside the report or order in whole or in part,

(d) Complaints, orders, and other processes of the Secretary under this section may be served in the same manner as provided in section 5 of the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," approved September 26, 1914.

Mr. Chairman, Loffer the following amend-

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Herrick: Page 6, line 13, after the word "packers" insert: "And any other person in his employ that the Secretary may see fit to call upon to testify."

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman and gentleman, I think this amendment, which is very short, is germane to the matter under discussion. I do not think it needs to be debated at any length, because I think it is to a great extent self-explanatory, and I would like to have it voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that he was in doubt.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I have sent to the desk, which I offer at this time.

Amendment offered by Mr. Collins: Page 7, line 12, strike out para-aph (c) on page 7.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee. I have read this bill and have considered carefully certain phrases of it, and I am thoroughly in sympathy with the idea that there should be suitable and proper stockyard regula-tions. However, as the bill is drawn, I am afraid that it will bring no relief whatever, as it is my judgment that it is defective and unconstitutional in several of its provisions, and if this is the case the courts in construing it will strike it down, because the provisions, if held invalid, will destroy the entire bill. In order to bring to your attention the thoughts I have in mind, let me summarize most of that part of the bill pertaining to the regulations of packers.

In section 202 certain acts enumerated are unlawful when committed by a packer or packers. These acts are those condemned in the anti-Federal trust laws in practically every State in this Union, and I do not regard it necessary to detail them.

In section 203 it is provided that whenever the Secretary of Agriculture is of the opinion that a packer has violated any of the provisions of the act, it is his duty to serve a complaint on the packer enumerating the charges, and after a full and complete hearing, at which the packer has a right to be represented by counsel and the right to cross-examine witnesses and intreduce witnesses in his own behalf, an order is made directing the packer to cease and desist from further violations of the law.

In section 204 an appeal from the order of the Secretary to the circuit court of appeals, which hears the case on the record made by the Secretary of Agriculture, but the court, however, has the right to secure additional evidence if it deems such necessary. The circuit court of appeals is given the power then to affirm, set aside, or modify the order, and pending the appeal may, in its discretion, issue a temporary injunction against a violation of the order made by it, and the decision of the circuit court of appeals is final and operates as an injunction, except the case may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States on a writ of certiorari, but the allowance of this writ does not operate as a stay of the decree in so far as it operates against the injunction unless the Supreme Court of the United States so orders.

In section 205 it is made a criminal offense to violate any order that is final in its nature, either of the Secretary of Agriculture, circuit court of appeals, or the Supreme Court of the United States. It is necessary for us to realize at the outset that the Secretary of Agriculture is a part of the executive branch of this Government and the primary duties that are imposed upon the Secretary of Agriculture under this act. If it is his duty under it to perform a delegated legislative power, then such delegation would be void because Congress can not delegate to an officer in the executive branch of the Government purely legislative duties. If, on the other hand, it is strictly judicial powers that are conferred on him, then this, too, would be unconstitutional for the reason that an executive officer can not perform strictly legislative duties and strictly executive duties, too. For if he could it would be possible for an officer in the executive branch of the Government to likewise be an officer in the judicial branch of the Government, and this is forbidden under our Constitution.

In my State that part of the constitution which deals with the separate power theory of the Government is practically the same as the similar provisions in the Constitution of the United States, and the Supreme Court of Mississippi decided in the case of State v. Armstrong (91 Miss., 513) that a mayor of a municipality was a public officer within the meaning of the constitution of the State, and that the office of mayor was an executive office, and that he could not exercise the powers of a justice of the peace, which powers the statute undertook to confer upon him-that under the separate power theory of the Government the executive and judicial powers could not be blended into the same persons at the same time. Likewise, in the case of Isom v. State (36 Miss., 300), the court held that a legislative officer could not exercise judicial power. In Lawson v. Jeffries (47 Miss., 696), it was held that a constitutional convention holding the powers of the people in their sovereign capacity in their hands could not exercise judicial power. That the functions of a constitutional convention were necessarily legislative in their character, and that it was a fundamental principle that under the American theory of government it could not exercise the powers of other departments of the Government. (See also Quiniti v. Bay St. Louis, 64 Miss., 483; Ex Parte O'Leary, 3 So., 144; Nebraska Telephone Co. v. State ex rel. Yeiser, 45 L. R. A., 113; Norwalk Street Railway v.

State, 69 Conn., 576, etc.)
In the case of Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Mayatt (98 Fed., 335) it was held that the power to make rates was a legislative one and that a Kansas statute which created a court of visitation and conferred upon this court the power to make rates and other orders for the government of railroads and common carriers, and also undertook to give the court the powers of a court with all the machinery and equipment of a court was in conflict with the constitution of that State which directed the separate powers of the government to be vested in three separate and distinct departments—that the statute was unconstitutional, for it conferred upon this body powers belonging to more than one of the three distinct departments of government. In the Kansas case is a very liberal discussion of the authorities on this question.

The Supreme Court of Kansas reached the same conclusion in the case of State v. Johnson (61 Kans., 843). The opinion in this case discusses the distribution of the powers of the Government and held that the act could not confer upon the court of visitation powers belonging to two separate departments of the Government. This question is an important one.

All writers on free government are of the opinion that it is necessary to keep the three branches of the Government separate and apart from each other, otherwise the maintenance of free government is in danger, and I can see no good reason why this Congress should pass an act which undertakes to blend the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government. If this is done and should be sustained by the courts, the very form of our Government would ultimately be destroyed.

If, on the other hand, it is considered that the power conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture is merely an executive power, then there should be no right of appeal from an order made by him to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, for it would be an unwarranted exercise of power of the judicial department of the Government to review on appeal the orders of an executive officer. An appeal could no more be granted from an order of the Secretary of Agriculture than from the President of the United States. A court can not hear an appeal other than a judicial appeal. That is an appeal from a judicial tribunal and, however important it might be to have the judgments of the legislative and executive departments passed on by the Supreme Court, this can not be done directly from them. It is a universal doctrine that a court under our theory of government can only exercise judicial powers.

eral undertook to have the court exercise functions which were not judicial in their nature, but the court was of the opinion that they were not called upon to exercise any but judicial functions. In the case of United States v. Farriera (13 Howard 40), where Congress, by certain acts, directed the judge of the territorial court of Florida to receive, examine, and adjudicate all cases of claims for losses, and report his decisions, if in favor of the claimants, together with the evidence upon which they were founded, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, on being satisfied that the same were just and equitable within the provisions of the treaty, should pay the amount thereof, and by further act of Congress directs the judge of the district court of the United States for the Northern District of Florida to receive and adjudicate certain claims in the manner directed by law, and the Supreme Court of the United States held in that case that an appeal from such judges, undertaking to act in such capacity would not lies because he was not exercising a judicial power. The court, in its opinion, used the following language:

we will next consider the character of the tribunal whose decision is before this court for revision, and on this several points of inquiry suggest themselves: First. Was it a mere commission, not judicial in its character, whose decision could be taken up and revised by the Secretary of the Treasury is his capacity as an executive officer? Second, Was it a judicial tribunal, part of the judicial system created by the Acts of 1823 and 1824, which acted and decided judicially, but from which an appeal may not lie to a court but to the Secretary of the Treasury? Third, or was it a judicial tribunal whose decision was final in all cases coming within the special jurisdiction conferred upon it in the treaty? Fourth, or was it an ordinary judicial tribunal from which either of the other cases an appeal lies to this court.

It is stated parenthetically that upon each of these questions the discussion was very exhaustive and elaborate, and a third question arose as to whether the decision was final, and whether an appeal would lie from the judge to the court.

On page 49 of 13 Howard and on page 45 of 14 Lawyers' Edition of the United States Supreme Court Reports the court says:

It would seem, indeed, in this case that the district judge acted the erroneous opinion that he was exercising judicial power directly under the Constitution and has given this proceeding as much of the formal proceedings in a court of justice as was practicable.

And in a well-considered opinion the court held "that it was not a judicial tribunal and that an appeal did not lie to the Supreme Court." It would seem that under these authorities the question at bar would be settled against the power of appeal in this particular case

It is positively foolish for one to say that an appeal will lie from an administrative body clothed with legislative power or from an officer in the executive branch of the Government to a judicial tribunal. An appeal will lie from one court to another, and the court need not be called a court, but it must have the attributes of a court. It must have the right to carry out its own judgment or decree or to issue writs or judicial provisions for the enforcement of its orders. If it does not have the attributes of the court, and if its decision is not judicial, then an appeal will not lie from it to another court, and by judicial decision is meant the application by a court of competent jurisdiction of a law to a state of facts proven or deemed to be true and a declaration of the consequences which follow. The judicial power of the courts includes, among other things, the power to hear and finally determine controversies between adverse parties. So we are in this attitude: If a strictly legislative power is conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture, then he can not exercise it because he belongs to the executive branch of the Government. If it is sought to confer upon him judicial powers, this, too, can not be done, because he belongs to the executive branch of the Government, and no officer in the one can exercise powers primarily belonging to the other. And certainly under no conditions would an appeal lie from a decision of an executive officer or a legislative body to the courts. In order for the power to be properly and lawfully conferred, a commission should be created for the purpose of regulating packers and the stockyards, as was done by the Congress with reference to railroads and carriers, and was further done by the Congress with reference to regulation of corporations by the Federal Trade Commission, and as has been done also by the Congress in other cases. We have had too much usurpation of power already by other branches of the Government, and this Congress should not further countenance it.

I also direct your attention to the case of Gordon v. United States (117 U. S., p. 697). The court here holds that an appeal will not lie direct to a court from a decision of the legislative or executive departments of the Government. I submit to you the following extracts from the opinion in that case:

The existence of this court is, therefore, as essential to the organization of the Government established by the Constitution as the election of a President or Member of Congress. It is the tribunal which is ultimately to decide all judicial questions confided to the Government of the United States. No appeal is given from its decisions, nor any power given to the legislative or executive departments to interfere with its judgments or process of execution. Its jurisdiction and powers and duties being defined in the organic law of the Government, and being all strictly judicial, Congress can not require or authorize the court to exercise any other jurisdiction or power or perform any other duty. Chancellor Kent says: "The judicial power of the United States is in point of origin and title equal with the other powers of the Government, and is as exclusively vested in the court created by or pursuant to the Constitution as the legislative power is vested in Congress or the executive power in the President." (1 Kent Com., 290–291, 6th ed. See also Story Const., pp. 449–450.)

The position and rank therefore assigned to this court in the Government of the United States differ from that of the highest judicial power in England, which is subordinate to the legislative power, and bound to obey any law that Parliament may pass, although it may, in the opinion of the court, be in conflict with the principles of Magna Charta or the Petition of Rights.

(2) In No. 38 of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison, the necestive and challed of this reversion is closely extend to the legislative power.

Petition of Rights.

(2) In No. 38 of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison, the necessity and object of this provision is clearly stated. In that number, after explaining with great perspicuity the complex character of the Government, being partly National and partly Federal, he proceeds to say (p. 265, Towson's Ed.): "In this relation, then, the proposed government can not be deemed a national one, since its jurisdiction extends to certain enumerated objects only, and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects. It is true that in controversies relating to the boundary between the two jurisdictions, the tribunal which is ultimately to decide is to be established under the General Government. But this does not change the principle of the case. The decision is to be impartially made, according to the rules of the Constitution, and all the usual and most effectual precautions are taken to secure this impartiality. Some such tribunal is clearly essential to prevent an appeal to the sword and a dissolution of the compact."

(3) But the appeal is given only from such inferior courts as Con-clearly essential to prevent an appeal to the sword and a dissolution of the compact."

(3) But the appeal is given only from such inferior courts as Congress may ordain and establish to carry into effect the judicial power specifically granted to the United States. The inferior court, therefore, from which the appeal is taken, must be a judicial tribunal authorized to render a judgment which will bind the rights of the parties litigating before it, unless appealed from, and upon which the appropriate process of execution may be issued by the court to carry it into effect. And Congress can not extend the appellate power of this court beyond the limits prescribed by 'he Constitution, and can neither confer nor impose on it the authority or druy of hearing and determining an appeal from a commissioner or auditor, or any other tribunal exercising only special powers under an act of Congress; nor can Congress authorize or require this court to express an opinion or a case where its judicial power could not be exercised, and where its judgment would not be final and conclusive upon the rights of the parties, and process of execution awarded to carry it into effect.

(4) The Constitution of the United States delegates no judicial power to Congress. Its powers are confined to legislative duties, and restricted within certain prescribed limits. By the second section of Article VI the laws of Congress are made the supreme law of the land only when they are made in pursuance of the legislative power specified in the Constitution; and by the tenth amendment the powers not delegated to the United States nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. The reservation to the States respectively can only mean the reservation of the rights of sovereignty which they respectively possessed before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States and which they had not parted from by that instrument. And any legislation by Congress beyond the limits of the power delegated would be void: and it would be the duty of the courts to declare it so. For whether an act of Congress is within the limits of its delegated power or not is a judicial question, to be decided by the courts, the Constitution having, in express terms, declared that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the Constitution.

(5) And it is very clear that this court has no appellate power over these special tribunals, and can not, under the Constitution, take jurisdiction of any decision upon appeal, unless it was made by an inferior court exercising independently the judicial power granted to the United States. It is only from such judicial decisions that appellate power is given to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Chairman, my amendment is offered for the purpose of eliminating an appeal from the Secretary of Agriculture to the circuit court of appeals; and as an additional amendment, if this be adopted, I shall offer in the next paragraph, on page 8, line 2, after the word "conclusive," to insert the words "and shall take effect within 30 days and shall continue in force until changed, modified, or set aside by the Secretary," and then to strike out the rest of the paragraph.

My reason for offering this amendment and the other one which I shall offer if this be adopted is this: This Congress has never created a body and given to that body authority or power and then permitted a court on appeal to review a decision of that body

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Let me get through with my thought first. Take, for instance, the Interstate Commerce Commission. Delegated legislative powers are given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if an aggrieved party is not satisfied with the action of that body, he goes into the district court by injunction and then the case gets into court by that method. In other words, the Interstate Commerce Commission is a party to the It does not decide or judge, but it is a party to the litigation. litigation. The same thing is true with the Federal Trade Commission. No right to appeal direct from a decision of this body to a court is anywhere conferred and could not be conferred. It has to go into a court as a party in order to carry out its orders. If you have the right of appeal, you are creating of the Secretary of Agriculture a court, and the Secretary of Agriculture belongs to the executive department of the Government. You can not make of an officer of the executive department of the Government a judge of the court. If you could do this, you could make the President of the United States a judge, and if this practice were continued then you would have a blending of the three powers of this Government to such an extent that the Government itself would be destroyed. That is precisely what you are undertaking to do in this case.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COLLINS. I wish the gentleman would permit me to get through with my thoughts first and then I shall be glad to yield. In the State of Kansas the legislature created the court of visitation with definite powers belonging to two separate departments of the Government. The supreme court of that State held, as I have heretofore shown, that that could not be done. In my State, where the constitutional provisions of the State constitution, as far as the three separate departments of government are concerned, are similar to those in the Constitution of the United States, the supreme court of that State in the Dodd case held that an appeal from the railroad commission of that State to the railroad commission exercised merely delegated legislative powers, and that a court would not have the right to review their holdings any more so than they would have the right to review the action of the governor of the State or of the legislature of the State.

It has been held that the mayor of a municipality could not exercise the duty of a justice of the peace because these duties belong to two separate distinct departments of this government.

Mr. JACOWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I will.
Mr. JACOWAY. I will ask the gentleman if that decision in his supreme court was not based on this proposition: That it was in construing the specific acts under which that mayor was acting and the specific verbiage

Mr. COLLINS. The supreme court of the State said that the legislature undertook to put into the hands of that officer distinct powers belonging to two separate departments of the government. Assuming, for instance, that there is the right of appeal from a decision of an executive officer to a court, it certainly has never been conferred by this Congress before and could not be conferred, and in numerous decisions which have gone to the Supreme Court of the United States it has been held an appeal would not lie from a governmental department or a legislative branch of the Government to a court,

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I will. Mr. TINCHER. Is it not true that the decision of the court to which the gentleman refers was based on the fact that your State constitution creating its supreme court gave it only jurisdiction in cases of appeal?

Mr. COLLINS. No. That was involved, but that was not everything that was held in the opinion.

Mr. TINCHER. Is not there this difference, the difference in the constitution of your State, where the supreme court of your State was given authority and the difference in the Constitution of the United States, under which the circuit court of appeals

Mr. COLLINS. No. The constitution of my State and the constitution of yours and every other State divides this Government into three separate distinct classes, and that is what the gentleman mentions?

I am discussing.

Where can I find the case from his State Mr. TINCHER.

Mr. COLLINS. The Dodd case. I can not give the citation right now, but I can find it and refer the gentleman to it later on.

Mr. TINCHER. I have been informed that decision was based upon the proposition as to the violation of your constitution which only gave the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction.

Mr. COLLINS. It is an unheard-of proposition. Take the Farriera case, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, which holds that you can not appeal from a decision of an officer of an executive branch of the Government to a court, and it holds that you can not appeal from the decision of the executive officer to a court. If an appeal in this instance is allowable, then courts could review the action of this Con-

Mr. COLLINS. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is it not a fact the courts are continually taking jurisdiction upon writs of certiorari?

Mr. COLLINS. That is an entirely different matter. this case the Secretary of Agriculture is a party to the litigation and an appellate court, too.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. He is a party to the litigation?

Mr. COLLINS. But under this law the court, too. I submit we can not do this.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman mean to say seriously that the Secretary of Agriculture is a party to the litigation?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; and tries the case, too.
Mr. CHINDBLOM. Then we are getting the true inwardness of the operation of this legislation if the Secretary is a party.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to get this clear. Of course, this is only part of the proposed change which the gentleman intends to make?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman intends to take

Mr. COLLINS. I intend to add this amendment: On top of page 8, line 2, after the word "conclusive," add "and shall take effect within 30 days and shall continue in force until changed, medified, set aside by the court," and then follows my amendment striking out the rest of paragraph 204.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for two minutes.

Mr. JACOWAY. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. COLLINS. The remainder of the section.
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That would entirely take away the injunctive features.

Mr. COLLINS. It takes away the right of appeal.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It takes away the right of the court to enjoin.

Mr. COLLINS. No; the packer would have this right any-

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I call the attention of the gentleman to section (c), at the bottom of the page.

Mr. COLLINS. Under the law as it exists now they have

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Well, section (c) provides when the Secretary makes this order, when he files it, the court may issue a temporary injunction restraining-

Mr. COLLINS. I am striking that out, because they have that right now

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman thinks that is repeated in another place?

Mr. COLLINS. No; that is the law now. Here is what can be done. Any order made by any board like the Interstate Commerce Commission can be enjoined for three reasons: First, that the power to exercise it is unconstitutional; second, that they have no lawful authority for its exercise, or that the order no proof to sustain it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is the enforcement of the

Mr. COLLINS. That is the law as it is now.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am talking about the provision in subdivision (c), which provides for a temporary injunction restraining the packers and others.

Mr. COLLINS. My amendment is almost the language of the law as it is now with reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. You were dealing with the question of enjoining the enforcement of the order. I am talking about the power they give the court to enforce it.

Mr. COLLINS. I want to make the action of the Department of Agriculture final. I have serious doubts as to whether or not the Department of Agriculture can perform these duties, because I have a sort of sneaking idea that these powers are legislative, and if they are, an executive officer could not perform them. And I would infinitely prefer that a commission would be established to perform these duties.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Here is the precise question I am coming to with reference to the bill as it would read if it should be amended as the gentleman proposes. Now, the Secretary of Agriculture makes the order. Of course, there is no way to punish anyone for violation of the Secretary's order, except as provided in this act, as I view it. This act provides that the transcript shall be filed, and then the court shall have the power to enforce that order by injunction or otherwise. Your amendment would strike that out.

Mr. COLLINS. I think the gentleman misunderstands this act. This act undertakes to permit the court to review the action of an officer in the executive department of the Government.

And that is all it does undertake to do.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I thoroughly understand that. This act provides that the Secretary shall make the order; that there can be an appeal from that order, and that the court can That would be destroying the order. But if the set it aside. Secretary makes the order and you wipe out all the other statutes dealing with the court's power, how do you enforce the

Mr. COLLINS. You can go into court, by prosecution, or the Secretary of Agriculture can go into court, and make the given packer carry out his order by becoming a party to the litigation.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to page 11, paragraph If you strike out all this appeal business, then you have it "after such order has been sustained by the court," and you strike that out and then have that "after such order shall be made anyone shall on conviction of violation be fined not less than $500 or more than $10,000." You have got to go into the Federal court, anyway.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is the point I am making. If the gentleman's proposed amendment would go through, then you would leave the only punishment as a punishment for the violation of an order for which they would have the right of trial by jury. The order itself gives a right to injunctive relief in addition to the relief provided on page 11, and the point I am making is that the gentleman's amendment, which would eliminate all the part the court takes under the act, would eliminate the injunctive relief.

Mr. COLLINS. No; under the law as it is now, aside from this act, a packer could go into court and enjoin the Secretary of Agriculture from carrying out the order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am talking about the power for the enforcement of the order, and the gentleman is talking about enjoining the enforcement of the order.

Mr. STEVENSON. It strikes me the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Collins] has put his finger on a rather fundamental difficulty in this bill as it is. Remember that the Secretary of Agriculture is one of the executive officers of this Government. He is clothed with certain powers, and when he exercises those powers after having had a hearing and sworn witnesses, then the provision has been made to appeal from him to the circuit court of appeals. That is a constitution of the Secretary of Agriculture a court. Now, I hear it said that the Dawes Commission was created by legislative enactment to try certain rights in Indian Territory and that an appeal was allowed to the courts from its decision. To be sure, the Dawes Commission was merely a statutory court created by Congress for the purpose of trying certain cases and certain issues, and an appeal was allowed to the higher courts as a necessary measure.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The point which the gentleman is now urging will not be remedied by the motion by the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, will it?

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, I think it will all lead to the further amendment which he proposes to make.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me ask further. The gentleman is making the point that it would be unconstitutional, I take it, to give the Secretary of Agriculture judicial powers. remedied by providing for an appeal to any other court, is it?

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not making the point from the standpoint of the gentleman from Illinois. Frankly, I am in favor of this legislation, and I want to see it put on the statute books in such form that it will be valid, and so that no great packing concern will be able to drive a four-horse team through it when it gets it into court. The executive may determine whether these people are conforming to law to the extent of determining whether they have got the right to continue to do business in interstate commerce, and he may determine that as an executive function, and the Secretary of Agriculture is given the right to determine that as an executive function. But whenever you make him an inferior court, with the regular appeal from him on up to the other courts, you will find the courts will say that that is an unmistakable designation of him as a court, and he being a member of the executive branch of the Government is incompetent to sit as a court, and therefore you will find the statute very successfully attacked at that point, and that is the crucial point, because it is the enforcement point. Now, if you strike out the provisions about appeal and leave the power in the Secretary to find whether these men are violating the law or not, and make these findings of fact prima facie evidence in any court to establish a case against them for violating the statute, then, when he has got the findings, and they violate the law, the Government can invoke the power of the Federal court for enforcement. It puts the burden on the other party to prove its innocence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent Mr. STEVENSON. to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.
Mr. KINCHELOE. Is it the contention that the Congress of the United States has not the right to delegate these powers to the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. STEVENSON. No. The power to determine whether this statute is being violated, as laid down here, can be given to the Secretary; but my position is that it can not be given to him as a court but as an executive, and if you undertake to give it to him as a court, with the right to appeal, as arranged here, you create him as an inferior court with the power given to appeal to the superior court, and you will make the bill open to that assault.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As I understand the act, there is a provision that whenever the Secretary of Agriculture finds that certain of these unlawful things have been done, or thinks they have been done, he may, upon hearing, issue an order forbidding the commission of such acts?

STEVENSON.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of course, that is not an injunction and there could be no prosecution for violation of that except as provided in the law. It is my understanding that the law has two ways of enforcing that power.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The order is filed with the circuit court of appeals, and under subdivision (g) we find this

If the circuit court of appeals affirms or modifies the order of the Secretary, its decree shall operate as an injunction to restrain the packer, and his officers, directors, agents, and employees from violating the provisions of such order or such order as modified.

And under the former provision the mere filing of the order operates as an injunction, and, of course, the violation of an injunction may be punished in the ordinary way without a jury, just as the punishment of any other injunction is made. And on page 11 there is a provision for the conviction of the violation of the order.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I take it that there are two remedies. Under the latter remedy you would have the right to trial by jury. The point I was making is whether or not the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi would take away that injunctive power.

Mr. STEVENSON. If it takes it away, the general power of the Federal court to enjoin combinations of this kind is left, and the way is open for the Secretary of Agriculture to ask the court to enjoin it in the Federal court, where there is an appeal already provided for and where there is provision for a

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. I would like to know if the gentleman thinks it would be constitutional? While, of course, Congress can create such inferior courts from time to time, can the Congress deny them their property without due process of law?

Mr. STEVENSON. If the Congress creates a court here, the Constitution provides that there must be a road up to the Supreme Court from the court created. There are all the earmarks of that here, because this provides for a court of appeals and a writ of certiorari from there to the Supreme Court of the United States. But if they provide for a court as an executive function to determine prima facie whether these people are violating the rights covered in the statute, and it shall be held prima facie, but it shall not be conclusive, and they have the right to go into court, they can confer that right upon him, but they can not create a court and make an executive officer of the Government that court. There are other things that I want to call attention to in connection with that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. STEVENSON. In a moment. You will notice that the circuit court of appeals shall have the right to take testimony and swear witnesses. Where is there any provision in the bill for the court of appeals having any machinery to do that? It is absolutely unworkable.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman contend that while the courts can not take away property without due process of law an executive officer can do that?

Mr. STEVENSON. No. The executive officer can make a prima facie finding. If the corporation is not satisfied with it, it can go into court, and that merely stands as a prima facie finding, and the Federal court will have to try it.

I hope, gentlemen, you will put this bill in such shape that you will not have the shadow of such litigation hanging over this law when it is passed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recog-

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi attacks the entire procedure for determining whether there is or is not a violation of the act. I am afraid the gentleman from Mississippi has not sufficiently considered the character of the acts made unlawful by this bill. The bill makes unlawful certain acts on the part of the packers. It prohibits, for instance, unfair, unjust, discriminatory, or deceptive practices or devices. I think it will be at once admitted that a flat prohibition of that sort, followed by a criminal penalty, to be enforced in a court, would be held to be unconstitutional, just as it was held to be unconstitutional in the case of That is to say, the provisions of this act are not the Lever Act. sufficiently definite to stand as a basis for criminal prosecution directly. Therefore we have sought to interpose an administra-tive agency—the Secretary of Agriculture—who does not act as a court, but as an administrative officer, and he finds whether certain acts committed by the person charged with them are acts prohibited by the statute.

As I said the other day, business is progressive, and there must be a certain amount of flexibility in the prohibitions in order that the prohibitions may keep up with the progress of industry. If we had failed to provide an appeal from this administrative order, the law would be clearly unconstitutional, because of its failure to provide due process of law in taking the property of the packer or finding him guilty of a criminal offense without due process of law.

Now, then, when you undertake to make an act under a more or less indefinite prohibition unlawful, it seems to me that it is entirely proper and necessary to interpose an appeal to the court. For instance, here is a packer engaged in a certain course of procedure. He is cited before the Secretary of Agriculture under this act. He admits that he is engaging in this character of procedure, but he denies that it is a violation of the law. He claims that his course of conduct is a perfectly legitimate course of conduct in consideration of the circumstances touching the business, but the Secretary of Agriculture finds as an administrative officer that course of conduct is prohibited by this act. Now, clearly, it seems to me that from such an order there should be the right of appeal, and for that reason we have interposed here from the order of the Secretary of Agriculture the right of appeal direct to the circuit court of appeals.

Now, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Stevenson] stated that there was power on the part of the circuit court of appeals to take testimony. That statement shows that he has not given the bill the attention and the consideration which a man ought to give it before he attacks it in the way in which the gentleman from South Carolina attacked it. The circuit court of appeals has the right, if it thinks the order of the Secretary is not supported by evidence, to return the case to the Secretary of Agriculture with directions to him to take additional testimony, and upon that additional testimony to make whatever order may be justified; but the circuit court of appeals has no power itself, under the procedure provided in this act, directly to take the testimony of witnesses. It sits to determine the validity of the order made by the Secretary of Agriculture on appeal.

I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Cali-

Mr. BARBOUR. In reading this bill it struck me that the powers conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture are very similar to those conferred upon him in the farmers' marketing bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not familiar enough with the farmers' marketing bill to answer that question.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], is it not a fact that they are very similar in their

Mr. TINCHER. Yes; they are. Mr. BARBOUR. I can not understand why the same procedure is not adopted in this bill that was adopted in the farmers' marketing bill—that is, giving the Secretary of Agriculture the power to make his investigations, his findings, and his orders as to whether the law is being complied with or not, and then empowering him to turn the matter over to the Department of Justice to proceed in the regular way by the courts; that is, first in the United States district court. I have not taken the trouble to go into the thing carefully, but I will admit that share the fears of some of the gentlemen who have talked here on the floor that this may result in a knocking out of the whole measure.

Mr. ANDERSON. There are dozens of cases, as in the case of the employers' liability commission and in the case of the Federal Trade Commission, in which an appeal is permitted from an administrative order. The order of the Federal Trade Commission and the order of the employees' liability commission are administrative orders, and the appeal is taken directly from that order to the circuit court of appeals. Now, let me say to the gentleman that the prohibitions in this act are very similar to the prohibitions in the Federal Trade Commission act.

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes. Mr. ANDERSON. And we followed substantially the prohibitions of the Federal Trade Commission act, with one exception. This exception occurs in the present bill and not in the original draft of the bill. Under the Federal Trade Commission act the findings of the commission, if supported by evidence, are conclusive; but under this bill that question is left open. The court upon appeal would determine, I suppose, in the first instance, under the language of this bill, whether the conclusions of the Secretary were final as to the evidence or not.

Mr. BARBOUR. In other words, there is no appeal from the Federal Trade Commission to the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; there is.
Mr. BARBOUR. Directly to the circuit court of appeals?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; directly to the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.
Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the procedure suggested by the gentleman from California [Mr. Barbour] were followed, you would still have an appeal from the district court to the circuit court of appeals, would you not?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. So that you are jumping a step and expediting and speeding the hearing of these cases. I think that is a virtue in the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is exactly the purpose of the propo-

Mr. BARBOUR. I think that is a virtue of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, when this question first came up I was under the same impression as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Collins]; but I have read and considered the language more thoroughly, and I do not think there is any question that this is a legal procedure. If the Secretary of Agriculture were given the power to inflict a penalty, that would be an illegal proceeding; but he is not given in this bill the authority of the court to impose a penalty. He simply establishes the status of the law. Under this bill certain things are declared to be inhibited. Now, if the Secretary of Agriculture comes to the conclusion that one of the packers is violating certain provisions of this law, he is not authorized to penalize the packer. He is not authorized to inflict a penalty. He is simply authorized to direct that the packer desist from a prac-In other words, he is attempting to establish the fact that that practice is unlawful under the provisions of this law. Now, the packer has the right to be heard.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. JONES of Texas, In a moment. They go into court, not to determine whether the packer shall be punished, but to determine whether a certain practice shall be continued. packer loses out and the Secretary wins, then the Secretary does not punish the packer. He simply says "the law is thus and so"; that is, that the regulation is pursuant to this act. Then, if the packer continues to violate the law, he has his day in court on the question whether or not he has violated the law as it has been construed or interpreted by this hearing. Now that is all there is to it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield now? Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Can there be an appeal to an appellate court which does not try cases de novo, but only on review of the decisions of another court?

Mr. JONES of Texas. There can not on a question of whether a man has violated the law, but on the question of establishing a regulation there may. You may make the Secretary's action final and make the man go into court on a specific question whether he is guilty of a violation. This simply permits the action of the circuit court before the order to desist becomes final. An analogous question has been directly up and been decided by various courts. The circuit court of appeals, on December 7, 1920, where objection was made that the Federal Trade Commission act was unconstitutional because it assumed to combine legislative, executive, and judicial powers to function and to confer them upon one and the same administrative body, contrary to Articles I, II, III of the Constitution, and because it assumed to authorize the commission, which is ostensibly an administrative body, to deprive persons of their property without due process of law, contrary to the fifth amendment of the Constitution, held:

This proposition is to our minds without merit. Congress plainly has power to declare unfair methods in competition unlawful and to require that their practice cease. This Congress has done by the act in question. It with equal clearness has the power to authorize an administrative commission to determine (a) the question of what methods of competition a given trader employs, and, (b) provisionally, the mixed question of law and fact whether such methods are unfair. These questions being determined against the trader, the administrative requirement to cease and desist prescribed by Congress follows as a matter of course, but only provisionally.

When you have established the law, then the question comes up, Has the packer violated the law? And if he violates it he has his day in court under due process of law, and that is legal.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Paragraph (b), page 7, provides:

If, after such hearing, the Secretary finds that the packer has violated or is violating any provisions of this title covered by the charges, he shall make a report in writing in which he shall state his findings as to the facts, and shall issue and cause to be served on the packer an order requiring such packer to cease and desist from continuing such richetter.

Assuming the gentleman's argument is correct, that he is acting as an administrator, why would not it be sufficient after notice had been served on the packer, if he violates the findings of the Secretary, then to indict him directly in the United States court without going through all this circuitous route?

Mr. JONES of Texas. There is considerable force in the gentleman's argument, but this is an important matter and it was thought it would not be wise to let one man have so much power in deciding whether a concern should proceed in business.

was giving a great deal of authority.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.
Mr. KINCHELOE. Is it not a fact that in court they would not be prosecuted for violating a ruling of the Secretary, but a violation of the law?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Violating the law. Now, in the case of Sears & Roebuck against the Federal Trade Commission, two hundred and fifty-eighth Federal, 307-

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. STAFFORD). The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I ask for three minutes more.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and pending amendments close in five minutes.

Mr. CABLE. I want a little time.

Mr. HAUGEN. Three minutes will be given to the gentleman from Texas and two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in the case I started to cite of Sears & Roebuck, they had established the practice of advertising that they had certain goods that they had got at a special price, which advertisement was not true and was declared to be unfair, and the identical question was raised, and the court in passing says this:

With the increasing complexity of human activities many situations arise where governmental control can be secured only by the "board" or "commission" form of legislation. In such instances Congress declares the public policy, fixes the general principles that are to control, and charges an administrative body with the duty of ascertaining within particular fields from time to time the facts which bring into play the principles established by Congress. Though the action of the commission in finding the facts and declaring them to be specific offenses of the character embraced within the general definition by Congress may be deemed to be quasi-legislative, it is so only in the sense that it converts the actual legislation from a static into a dynamic condition. But the converter is not the electricity. And though the action of the commission in ordering desistance may be counted quasi-judicial on account of its form, with respect to power it is not judicial, because a judicial determination is only that which is embodied in a judgment or decree of a court and enforceable by execution or other writ of the court.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman tell this Congress a single instance of an act ever passed by it which permits an appeal from an executive officer to a court?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; here is the Federal Trade Commission act after which this provision was fashioned:

The jurisdiction of the circuit court of appeals of the United States to enforce, set aside, or modify orders of the commission shall be exclusive.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. I want to state in corroboration of what the gentleman says that practically every State in the Union has a workmen's compensation act and it is provided that an appeal may lie to the court, and it is being done in every State in the Union to-day.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It is an established practice. In other words, the circuit court will simply establish the law; that is, clarify the provisions of the law. That has been followed all along in all the provisions and stipulations, and the Secretary does not perform the functions of a court, but the function of establishing regulations in carrying out the law. Once established the packers would not be fined for something that occurred before, but would be ordered to desist from the practice there-If he violated the provisions, he could be convicted in after. court.

I do not claim that the bill establishes the best method. In fact, I am inclined to think the method suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Collins] is preferable, but I believe this bill provides a legal method of review, and the comby a complaint to it, the opportunity to exert its administrative function."

At page 494, commenting upon the Abilene Cotton Oil case, the court said:

"In considering section 15 (by which the commission is not only empowered but the duty is imposed upon it in disposing of the case not only to determine the legality of the practice alleged to give rise to an unjust preference or undue discrimination, and to forbid the same, but, moreover, to direct the practice to be followed as to such subject for a future period not exceeding two years with power in the commission, if it finds reason to do so, to suspend, modify, or set aside the same, the order, however, to become operative without judicial action) in the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Central Railroad Co. (215 U. S., 452), it was pointed out that the effect of the section was to cause it to come to pass that courts, in determining whether an order of the commission should be suspended or enjoined, were without power to invade the administrative functions vested in the commission, and therefore, could not set aside an order duly made on a mere exercise of judgment as to its wisdom or expediency. Under these circumstances, it is apparent, as we have said, that these amendments add to the cogency of the reasoning which led to the conclusion in the Abilene case, that the primary interference of the courts with the administrative functions of the commission was wholly incompatible with the act to regulate commerce."

In the case of United States Pacific & Arctic Co. (228 U. S., 87), on an indictment for alleged violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act and the interstate commerce-act, the court said:

"The purpose of the Interstate Commerce Commission act is to establish a tribunal to determine the relation of community shippers and carriers and their respective rights and obligations dependent upon the act, and the conduct of carriers is not subject to judicial review in criminal or civil cases based on alleged violations of the act until submitted to and passed upon by the commission."

mitted to and passed upon by the commission."

The power to take evidence, find facts, and determine whether a law has been violated may properly be termed administrative and has frequently been conferred on administrative officers and bodies.

As will be seen from the following cases, the courts have recognized and frequently stated in their opinions that the decisions of administrative or executive officers on questions of fact and the construction and application of the law are judicial in their nature. They do not, however, exercise any of the "judicial power of the United States" conferred on the courts by the Constitution.

The following cases arising out of decisions of the Land Office, the Commissioner of Immigration, the Postmaster General, the collector of customs, show the administrative officers or heads of the respective departments have for years exercised quasi judicial powers or performed acts judicial in their nature, and the courts have upheld them. (Vance v. Burbank, 101 U. S., 514, 519.)

The decision by the Land Office on a question of fact, although in the nature of a judicial determination, was binding upon the parties and final. (U. S. ex rel. Riverside Oil Co. v. Hitchcock, 190 U. S., 316.)

This case involved a decision by an executive officer (Secretary of Interior) based on a finding of fact and the construction of a law, and the court refused to consider its correctness.

Ness v. Fischer (233 U. S., 683, 692). Petition to review ruling of Secretary of Interior refused. (Passavant v. U. S., 148 U. S., 214.)

Question whether a decision of the Board of General Appraisers ascertaining and fixing the dutiable volume of imported goods could be reviewed by the courts, the court refused to review the correctness of the department's decision. (Oceanic Navigation Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U. S., 320.)

This case went so far as to hold that penalties could be imposed by an administrative officer without a resort to the courts.

It also shows the attitude of the Supreme Court on the objection whic

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Collins) there were 8 ayes and 50 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 22, after the word "to," insert "file original complaint with the Secretary or to," so that it will read, "any person for good cause shown may on application be allowed by the Secretary to file an original complaint with the Secretary or to intervene in such proceeding and appear in person or by counsel."

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, while under section 203 the Secretary of Agriculture acts as a prosecutor and as a judge and as a jury and renders his decision-in other words, he has unlimited power to prosecute a packer-yet at the same time if he wants to act arbitrarily there is nothing in the section to compel him to investigate a complaint or take any action whatsoever under the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman forgot to state that the Secretary is also a party, according to the theory of the bill.

Mr. CABLE. Under the amendment that I have offered, if an injured person comes before the Secretary of Agriculture with his complaint, the Secretary would be compelled to take action and proceed in the prosecution. It precludes the Secretary from refusing to investigate or prosecute and permits an injured person to file his complaint with the Secretary and have a hearing. For that reason and for the purpose of protecting those who may be injured, I urge the amendment

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. Does the gentleman believe we ought to hinder the passage of this act by permitting any little shipper in the country who may be aggrieved to come in and demand that the Secretary give him a hearing and set in motion this machinery?

Mr. CABLE. I do not want to hinder the passage of the act at all, but I say that under this section as it now is printed the farmer, the small producer, or shipper in live stock, poultry, or eggs, when injured or damaged by the large packers, has no rights unless the Secretary of Agriculture wants to give them to him. The purpose of my amendment is to give a right of action to any injured party who may come before the Secretary of Agriculture with his complaint.

Mr. PURNELL. The purpose of the amendment as I see it is to compel the Secretary to permit any small aggrieved shipper to set in motion machinery that will clog the courts as well as the Secretary's office and prevent the real purpose of this measure.

Mr. CABLE. The gentleman is partly right. It would give a right to any shipper who is injured, but it would not clog the

It would protect the injured party.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does not the gentleman believe it is safe to leave it to the Secretary under the language of the bill which provides that "whenever the Secretary has reason to believe that any packer has violated" the law? Does not that take care of the situation?

Mr. CABLE. That is all right if you have a friendly Secretary of Agriculture, but if you have one that is not friendly, then the bill is no good.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Would not the gentleman be willing to assume that the Secretary of Agriculture would proceed in accordance with his duties and his oath of office?

Mr. CABLE. That is a presumption.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Do we not have to assume that in all legislation?

Mr. CABLE. That is a presumption, but at the same time you have to draw your bill so that it will protect the little man who may be injured. The poor have a right to file their com-plaint in our courts; State utility commissions are open to all; so is the Interstate Commerce Commission; why, then, should not the same rights be given under this bill?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman think we can draft legislation on the assumption and the presumption that men sworn to perform their duty are not going to do it?

Mr. CABLE. I think we have enough brains in Congress to

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, debate has been closed and the time exhausted.

Mr. WINGO. On this amendment? Mr. HAUGEN. On this amendment and all amendments to Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I think debate was closed on the amendment to strike out the section and any amendment thereto. I do not think there has been any motion or unanimous-consent request to close debate upon the whole section.

Mr. HAUGEN. The request was to close debate upon the amendment and all amendments to the section. If the gentleman from Arkansas desires to be heard, I have no objection

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk in my time to report again the pending amendment.

The Clerk again reported the Cable amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I feel sure that if the author of the amendment will reflect for a moment he will see that his amendment is restrictive. I think if he will study the provision he will see that the question is left open as to what shall satisfy the Secretary. I do not agree with my friend from Indiana [Mr. Purnell] that simply because a man happens to be a little shipper the Secretary ought not to be "pestered" by him. I have not much sympathy with the idea that some times finds expression in this Chamber that you ought not to be "pestered" with these little fellows, and the big fellows ought not to be "pestered" with things they start. I do not care if he is the meanest crap-shooting nigger in my State, if his rights have been invaded, the courts ought to be open to him, and whether it be to a judge or a Secretary, if a citizen says that his rights have been violated even to the extent of 10 cents, he ought to have his remedy in law.

I take it that under section 203 as it has been framed-and I suggest that to the author of the amendment—the presumption is that the Secretary is going to be honest and discharge his duty, and any shipper in the land, whether he be a large cattle grower, a large ranchman, or simply a "one-horse farmer," as the saying is, if he writes to the Secretary of Agriculture and says that a certain packing company is doing a certain thing that is vicious will have his complaint treated with respect. I am going to assume that the man who is big enough in his party to be appointed Secretary of Agriculture is going to see to it that that complaint is investigated and a determination made whether or not there is sufficient ground to justify him in setting in motion a formal hearing. Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. CABLE. Does the gentleman think the Secretary of Agriculture himself is going to investigate these complaints or let some one else do it for him?

Mr. WINGO. I think he is going to let somebody else do it for him, and that is one of the objectionable features of the bill. I am alarmed at the increasing tendency to have everything done by some Cabinet official, when I know that it is physically impossible for him to do it. It means that you are going to put some irresponsible man, however honest he may be, whose Ilmitations are such that he is in an inferior capacity, in the position where he will have to determine these things. That is one of the dangers of it. But we have to take the choice of What else are you going to do?

The presumption is that the Secretary of Agriculture will see to it that the act is honestly and fairly administered in the spirit in which Congress passes it, and I am sure that is true of the present Secretary of Agriculture. He impresses me as honest and sincere. Of course, he has to turn a great many of these things over to his subordinates, but I think that a proper Cabinet official is going to spend necessarily a great deal of time in checking up and seeing that those upon whom we must depend are capable of doing their duty, and honest, and that they are

Mr. CABLE. Under the bill as it is now drawn, under section 203, if you happen to have a Secretary of Agriculture who is arbitrary, does the gentleman think that these small people who may be injured would have any rights at all?

Mr. WINGO. That is true, but that is true in the administration of all laws. If the judge happens to be dishonest, if the prosecuting attorney or the district attorney happens to be neglectful or happens to be dishonest, we always suffer, but we must consider all laws on the presumption that all officials will do their duty. Now, if human nature is so weak that sometimes they will not do their duty, shall we refuse to do anything because, perchance, sometimes we have officials who do not do their duty?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 205. Any packer, or any officer, director, agent, or employee of a packer, who falls to obey any order of the Secretary issued under the provisions of section 203, or such order as modified—

(1) After the expiration of the time allowed for filing a petition in the circuit court of appeals to set aside or modify such order, if no such petition has been filed within such time; or

(2) After the expiration of the time allowed for applying for a writ of certiorari, if such order, or such order as modified, has been sustained by the circuit court of appeals and no such writ has been applied for within such time; or

(3) After such order, or such order as modified, has been sustained by the courts as provided in section 204, shall on conviction be fined not less than $500 nor more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not less than six months nor more than five years, or both. Each day during which such failure continues shall be deemed a separate offense.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. Amend the bill on page 11, line 6, after the figures "$10,000," by striking out the word "or" and inserting the word

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 11, line 6, after the figures "$10,000," strike out the word or " and insert in lieu thereof the word "and."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Hudspeth], to which he devoted practically no part of his argument, would compel the courts for a violation of the order of the Secretary to impose a fine of not less than $500 or more than $10,000, and also, in addition, imprisonment for not less than six months or more than five years. I want to call attention to the fact that this section further provides that each day during which the failure to obey the order of the Secretary continues shall be deemed a separate offense, so that for each day that the packer violates the order he will be subject to both fine and imprisonment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is there any provision here for a trial by jury, or is this a trial by a court?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There is nothing in the act to show that it is a trial by jury. I take it that in some cases it will not be a trial by jury, because it will be for a violation of an injunction in those cases. We have here both trial for violation of an injunction and trial for violating the law itself.

Further responding to the inquiry by the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Chairman, on page 9, section (g), I call attention to this provision:

If the circuit court of appeals affirms or modifies the order of the Secretary, its decree shall operate as an injunction to restrain the packer, and his officers, directors, agents, and employees from violating the provisions of such order or such order as modified.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I was asking the gentleman's opinion, because I read over two or three times the provisions of the section, and it is not clear to my mind whether it is intended to give relief both by injunction and by indictment. It is not clear at all. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Knutson] says it is intended to give both remedies.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am not so sure that it can be so construed. I am afraid it can be construed to this effect, that the violation of an injunction shall constitute an offense upon which a conviction may be had, so that if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Hudspeth] prevails, for the violation of the injunction a man must be both fined and imprisoned. The trial in that case would be by the court without a jury. I call your attention to the fact that on page 7 it is provided that the decree of the circuit court of appeals shall operate as an injunction.

Mr. HUDSPETH. My intention was to impose both fine and imprisonment,

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Exactly. Your intention is perfectly clear. Your intention is to put a man who violates the order of the Secretary in prison as well as to fine him for every day that he violates the order after it has been sustained by the court of appeals, even though an appeal is pending on a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. HUDSPETH. What do you want to do with him? Do you want to turn him loose?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; I do not want to turn him loose; but I do not think you should prescribe unusual and extreme penalties for violations of this legislation. One would think that the crime of larceny or arson would be insignificant as compared with the violation of the order of the Secretary of Agriculture, because in many cases for such crimes there is provided only fine or imprisonment, whereas in this case you would prescribe both fine and imprisonment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the speech of my colleague [Mr. HUDSPETH], and with more interest to some of the figures which he used in making his comparisons, and while I have not had time to review his figures, I think merely to remind him of one comparison which he made will be to show his error. I hold no brief for the packers, but in making these comparisons let us be sure and get the figures right. For example, Mr. Hudspeth named the price of lambs on foot in 1919 or in 1920, I do not remember which, and then stated, if I recall his statement correctly, that the price had declined since then more than 125 per cent. Now, a mere statement of the percentage figures shows the impossibility of it. For example, suppose lambs were selling on the hoof in 1920 for 15 cents a pound. If the price had declined more than 125 per cent since then there would be no price at all left. The price would be below zero.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will give the gentleman the exact figures as quoted from the Drovers' Journal. In 1920 lambs sold at 16 cents and this spring they sold at 7 cents.

Mr. BLACK. That would not be a decline of 120 per cent. It would be a decline of about 56 per cent, the way I figure.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Possibly I was in error in my statement of percentages.

Mr. BLACK. That is what I say. If one year ago a fat man weighed 300 pounds and since than has lost 120 per cent in weight, I would like to inquire of my colleague how much the fat man would now weigh? Or, indeed, would there be any fat man? The gentleman in making his comparison stated impossible figures. I did not arise, however, to discuss that particular matter. I will leave my colleague and good friend from Texas to revise his own figures.

But I do want to say that I am not in favor of this bill, for what I think is a very practical reason. I do not hold any brief for the packers. They may or may not be opposed to this legislation. I have not inquired. If we do not already have sufficient law making criminal any improper practices in which they indulge, then I favor supplementing the law in whatever manner may be necessary and leave it to the Department of Justice to enforce. But in my experience I have not seen anything connected with Government control and operation of business that has led me to desire to extend that system any fur-Public utilities, like the railroads, must of course be more closely regulated than ordinary business enterprises, because of their quasi public functions, but the results of that regulation have been by no means ideal, and I think we should be very slow to venture out into new fields of such regulation. I cut from my home weekly paper on Saturday.last a clipping which brought to my attention and judgment some very significant facts. One of the local grocers in my home town, whom I know very well personally and whose figures can be relied upon as being accurate, printed a budget of groceries comprising 14 items ranging from an 8-pound bucket of lard to 1 bushel of corn, and the total of which items sold in May, 1920, for an aggregate of $25.85. In the opposite column he quotes the same 14 items, and the price in May, 1921, is $11.79, or a decline of slightly more than 54 per cent average on these particular 14 items. Now, when I read that significant advertisement, knowing that this packers' bill was under consideration, I thought I would see whether or not the items ordinarily sold by the packers had made a corresponding decline with the average. So I find here the first item in the bill is an 8-pound bucket of lard which sold in May, 1920, for $2.75. That bucket of lard is now listed in May, 1921, at $1. I go on down further and I find 10 pounds of dry salt meat listed in May, 1920, for $2.80, and in the opposite column I find it now sells for $1.50.

The next item, 10 pounds of sugar-cured bacon, was listed in 1920 at $4.60. In the opposite column for May, 1921, I find the same 10 pounds of sugar-cured bacon sells for $2.75. So, analyzing further, the figures of these three packers' items in this budget of groceries, I find that the three items had undergone an average decline of 48 per cent in price, which at least is reasonably close to the average decline of 54 per cent of the whole list of items.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Now, I will not take the trouble to read a similar statement which I clipped last week from the Washington Star, but it shows practically the same results. A local grocery firm which has 155 stores in Washington and suburbs, in a page advertisement which it run Friday, May 16, listed 32 items, small quantities, which it sold for an aggregate of $14.08 at the high peak of prices. The same 32 items now sell for an aggregate of $7.49, which makes an average decline in the 32 items of 46 per cent. I carefully examined the list and found that of the 32 items there were 6 ordinarily sold by the packers. are: One pound of cheese, 1 pound of lard, 1 pound of compound, 1 pound of oleomargarine, 1 piece of shoulder meat, 1 pound of Crisco. The decline on these 6 items from the high war peak prices was 57 per cent as against the general average of 46 per cent of the 32 items. Now, here was the thought which came to my mind when I read and analyzed these figures for myself: Since the high peak of the war there has been a decline in the farmers' raw products of 58 per cent. That means that the wheat farmer, the corn farmer, the cotton farmer, and other farmers are averaging less than $1 for their products where they received $2 during the high peak of the war. But they can take that $1 and purchase practically as much in the way of items of groceries which I have cited as they could purchase when they got $2 for their products. If everything else had declined as much in proportion, the situation of the farmer would not be so bad. But what about the things that the Federal Government regulates? We regulate the railroads from top to bottom and from bottom to top and railroad rates are now at the highest peak, and I do not know whether there is any reasonable prospects of their being lowered at an early date; at least it seems a very slow response to general economic law which is bringing everything else down. The average receipts per ton-mile for class 1 railroads were 71 cents in 1917.

The average at the present time is approximately $1.22 per ton-mile. Therefore the farmer who now gets $1 for his product where he got $2 during the war period can go into the grocery store and purchase approximately as much for his dollar, including some of the packers' items, as he could purchase with his $2 a year ago; but when he goes down to a freight station to purchase railroad service that is regulated from top to bottom by the Government he pays $1.22 per ton-mile as against 71 cents in 1917. And I want to tell you these figures do not make me enthusiastic about further extending Government control and regulation of industry by the bureau system. If our present laws are not sufficient to define and punish any practices now indulged in by the packers which should be held criminal, then I say strengthen them and tell the Department of Justice to get busy. But judging from the consent decree recently entered in court against the five big packers, and which is now in full force and effect, I would conclude that present law is fairly well sufficient. I think the decree will leave anyone with that impression who reads it. It provides:

Defendants are enjoined from monopoly.

Defendants are enjoined from monopoly.
 From owning any interest in a stockyard or stockyard railroad.
 From letting anyone else use their distributing facilities, which, however, they may sell.
 From making, distributing, or dealing in fish, vegetables, fruits, sweets, molasses, preserves, spices, coffee and tea, nuts, flour, sugar, rice, bread and biscuit, and cereals, grain, and miscellaneous articles, including building hardware and materials, cigars, etc.
 From owning retail meat markets.
 Or cold storage warehouses, except at the stockyards or for their own products.
 Or dealing in milk or cream, except for manufacture of oleomargarine, etc.
 From any illegal trade practice.
 Decree that defendants file plans for sale of stockyards, their railroads, and newspapers.
 That they sell all cold-storage warehouses and retail meat markets.

12. And sell the goods mentioned in paragraphs 4 and 5.
13. That purchasers of stockyards agree to operate them.
14. Decree not to interfere with export trade except as to paragraphs 4 and 5.

15. Nor to bar the United States from suit as to poultry, butter, eggs, and cheese.

16. Defendants will disclose facts as to how they are carrying out the decree.

17. All their sales, etc., since October 1, 1919, are subject to review.

18. Jurisdiction is retained for enforcement of the decree.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. The freight is included in the price of the items the gentleman read awhile ago, is it not?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; and those items would be some cheaper perhaps if it were not for the present high level of freight

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. In the gentleman's argument he is not complaining against higher freight rates, because the price of the things that a man eats and wears and uses has gone down in spite of outrageous and robber freight rates.

Mr. BLACK. Truly, the price has gone down, and my contention is that if it were not for such a multiplicity of regulations of the railroads we would probably now have lower freight rates. I realize, of course, that rates on public utilities usually go up slower and come down slower during a period of abnormal fluctuation in prices such as we have been experiencing during the past several years than most other lines of business. That situation, of course, does not argue against reasonable regulation of public utilities. I do think, however, that the present situation raises a serious question if we have not carried railroad regulation too far. The next few months will probably tell the tale as to whether we have or not.

If we find we have, then we must correct the situation by appropriate amendments to present law. But whether we find we have overregulated the railroads or not, I am not convinced that we should start out on the multiplicity of regulations of the packers which this bill provides, and therefore I shall vote against it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in my time I want to state that I shall move to strike out the last sentence commencing on line 7, page 11, "each day during which such failure continues shall be deemed a separate offense." Mr. Chairman, I think that the Agricultural Committee has had a very difficult task on their hands in considering the question of passing packer legislation. Every one who has followed the question of the activities of the packing industry for the last few years feels that there ought to be some way in which some of the evils can be remedied. I feel that many things that have been said in reference to the packing industry have not been accurate. If I shall finally vote for this bill, the reason for it is because I think the framers of the bill refused to yield to the demagogic cry to regulate the prices in the packing industry. As I read this bill it does not regulate the prices to be charged for the packing products. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Hudspeth] says that it was his understanding that they would require reports of the earnings of the packers, and if too great they could be proceeded against under the provisions of this law. I find no such provision. I think the bill is subject to criticism because of the fact that it does not provide by law what shall be illegal, what shall be unlawful, what shall constitute a crime. It may possibly get beyond the narrow confines of the Constitution forbidding delegation of legislative power on that account, but nevertheless the bill gives to the Secretary of Agriculture the arbitrary power of deter-mining what shall constitute a crime. That is the reason I am going to offer an amendment to strike out the provision that each day during such period shall be deemed a separate offense.

Gentlemen of the committee, think what we do in this legislation. We provide in section 202 that it shall be unlawful for any packer to engage or use any unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive practice or device in commerce.

There is not a man sitting in this committee that knows what that means. It covers the whole field of the practice of the packers; it is not a restriction dealing with prices. I asked the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Anderson] that question the other day, and he responded that it was not the purpose to deal with prices. What do you undertake to deal with under section 202 when you say it shall be unlawful to engage in or use any unfair, unjustly discriminatory or deceptive practice in commerce? Nobody knows; you leave to the Secretary of Agriculture the whole field of the activity of the packers to say what is a deceptive practice or a discriminatory practice or what is unfair. He has a roving commission to go into every phase of the matter and to determine it, and then as an executive officer of the Government issue his arbitrary decree in the form of an order forbidding the packers in this great business to continue what their best judgment tells them to do.

It may be a bad practice and it may not be, but we leave to the Secretary of Agriculture the arbitrary power of issuing an order. They get around the constitutional provision because they say the order will be definite and that there is no provision for punishment until the order is violated. That is true, but when the order is issued there is the right of appeal, and that appeal is very limited. The court finally passes on it and the order becomes final, and then they proceed with two different remedies. The first is to proceed by injunction, and my friend from Texas [Mr. Hudspeth] says that he proposes to regulate the packers, proposes to provide a penalty which says that they shall be sent to the penitentiary. My friend from Texas wants to remember that this great Government of ours has always been jealous of the rights of its citizens, and it is not only the packers but the agents, employees, and many other persons under them who can be prosecuted by the terms of the act. If the orders are violated—and they are more or less indefinite—they may proceed in the courts as for contempt, when there will be no jury between the accused and the tribunal. The court shall have arbitrary power, and there is no limitation in this law as to the penalty the judge could put on them. He can fine them $100 or $10,000, and send them jail for as long a term as he chooses. In addition to that there is the provision over here that for a violation a man shall on conviction be fined not less than $500 or more than $10,000, or imprisonment not less than six months or more than five years, or both, and that each day during which such failure continues shall be deemed a separate offense. Suppose it continued for one year, we delegate our legislative power to the Secretary of Agriculture and let the Secretary of Agriculture make the law that provides that the judge may send the guilty person to jail as for contempt, and in addition we provide that you can prosecute him under this section, and if it has gone on for a year-365 days-you can send him to prison 5 years for each one of the 365 days. You provide for a life sentence for the violation of an order issued by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BURTNESS. What provision does the gentleman allude to as the prosecution for contempt?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Subdivision (g), page 9:

If the circuit court of appeals affirms or modifies the order of the Secretary, its decree shall operate as an injunction to restrain the packer and his officers, directors, agents, and employees from violating the provisions of such order or such order as modified.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HERRICK. Did the gentleman get a lot of this packinghouse literature yesterday, and did that excite him so much, or is it his own idea that causes him to say that we are going to legislate the packing business out of existence sooner or

[Laughter.]

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman has asked a very sensible question. I got some literature yesterday from Swift & Co. I read the letter, but I have not yet read the pamphlet. But I state to the gentleman that I think the packers were not excluded from the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which gives people the right of petitioning Congress. far as I am concerned, I shall give the same degree of consideration to a petition that comes from the people of the country whether it comes from the rich or the poor. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would say that the penalty that the gentleman is talking about has no application whatever to the violation of an injunction.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Oh, no. The order itself becomes the injunction and the court fixes the penalty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me suggest that for a violation of an injunction a man can be kept in jail until he purges himself, which might take to the last day of his life.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry, The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. There is an amendment pending now.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I suggest that we vote upon it now as I have an amendment which I desire to offer, which under the present situation would not be in order. I desire to discuss my own amendment and not talk to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any other gentleman desire to be heard upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, to strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and" so as to make the penalty a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $10,000 and imprisonment, I fear, would make the penalty so drastic that it would be impossible to get a conviction. There is danger of drafting legislation which makes it so drastic that it is ineffective,

If we strike out the words "each day during which such failure continues shall be deemed a separate offense," it would seem to me that it would practically wipe out the effectiveness of law. The packers might save the $10,000 or the $500 fine and then continue the violating indefinitely, which would make it a commercial proposition. It seems to me that the language as written in the bill is absolutely fair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Wingo: Page 9, line 11, after the word "reopened" insert the words "by the Secretary," and in line 12, after the word "evidence" insert the words "by the Secretary."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the object of the amendment is simply to carry out what I understand to be the intention of the committee, but I think if we do not insert the words which I have offered as an amendment we are liable to find ourselves in this situation: At the stage referred to in the text which this seeks to amend, the case has passed from the control of the Secretary and has gone into the exclusive control of the court. The language as written in the bill is that if the court determines that it requires the taking of additional evidence, the court shall order the hearing to be reopened for the taking of such evidence "in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as the court may deem proper." are going to have additional testimony taken, I think it should be taken by the agency which took it in the first instance, which is presumed to be more familiar with the record that has already been made up, and unless we insert the words "by the Secretary" the court might say that Congress has seen fit to give that jurisdiction to the court, and conclude that it can order the additional testimony taken in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as it may prescribe, and that therefore it may appoint a special master or a referee or a commission to take the testimony, or this or that agency. It would be infinitely better, if the court wants additional testi-mony, to make an order directing the Secretary to take the testimony upon the particular point that the court directs him to take it on, and then send the testimony up with the original record

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Of course, it is the purpose of this section and was the purpose of the committee to have the court take that additional testimony.

Mr. WINGO. Most of those with whom I have discussed it have told me the opposite. Is that the opinion of the committee or was it the intention of the committee to let the Secretary take it?

Mr. PURNELL. I thought that point was perfectly clear. I think my colleague on the committee from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] is in error.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, that is an illustration of the necessity for my amendment. If the committee thinks the court ought to take the testimony, then it ought to say so specifically, that it shall be taken by the court, or if the committee thinks that the Secretary ought to take it, then my amendment ought to be adopted. I think we ought to remove the confusion that has arisen among the members of the committee.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If there is no change made in the section as written, might it not give the circuit court of appeals authority to appoint a commissioner to take the testimony?

Mr. WINGO. I suggested that the language is so broad that the court could designate anybody in the United States-the court could say to anyone, "We will appoint you the special master for the purpose of taking additional testimony." doubt if any court would do that, but the court might say that under this language.

What construction would the gentleman Mr. PURNELL. place on the last words in line 18, "with the return of such additional evidence"?

Mr. WINGO. I interpret that and the language in that paragraph (f) from line 13 on, that it was the intention of the committee that the Secretary should do it, but the bill provides that the case may be reopened for the taking of such additional evidence "in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as the court may deem proper," and that gives the court absolute power over the agency which is to take the testimony, the time limit of the testimony, and all of that. It will be better to direct the court to call on the Secretary to reopen the case and take the additional testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas

has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I think there were two minutes of the time that were not used, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAYTON. Does not the gentleman think the whole matter is settled in the last words of line 16 on page 19, which provide that the Secretary may modify his findings as to the facts by reason of the additional evidence so taken

Mr. WINGO. I get the gentleman's point, but let me show the gentleman why he is in error. Suppose the court should appoint the gentleman as a special master and he should take the testi-mony. The Secretary then, under this, could go ahead and say, "I have read over the testimony taken by the special master, and under the law I am given authority to modify my findings and recommendations." He could still do that. The object of my amendment is to make it beyond all question. I do not care where the amendment comes in, but I think the matter ought to be made clear, because there seems to be confusion among the members of the committee and among the Members of the House, I think we ought to say "by the Secretary"; in other words, that the case is to be reopened by the Secretary upon the order of the court and that the Secretary is to take such additional evidence as the court may direct him to take.

If the court is not clear along any particular point, then it can say to the Secretary, "You will reopen this case, take testimony along certain lines, and report to the court," so that it may pass upon it.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is there any circumstance now under which the circuit court of appeals can take testimony or evidence?

Mr. WINGO. I do not recall any.

Mr. BARBOUR. I never heard of any. I have understood that the circuit court of appeals was strictly a court of review. Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is a good lawyer. Where does the circuit court of appeals get jurisdiction?

Mr. BARBOUR. From the Congress.

Mr. WINGO. Certainly; then Congress by this act could give them jurisdiction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the amendment limits the taking of testimony to the Secretary. I think it should at least be the Secretary or his authorized agent. take it the gentleman does not want to hamper proceedings and delay them. The very thing the gentleman contends for is provided for in the bill.

Mr. WINGO. That objection would go to the original hearings, because they have to be by the Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is exhausted. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas. The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 7, strike out the language "each day during which such failure continues shall be deemed a separate offense."

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. CHINDBLOM) there wereayes 16, noes 49.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 2, after the word "conclusive," insert "shall take effect within 20 days and shall continue in force until changed, modified, or set aside by the court," and strike out the rest of the paragraph.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the section has been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again reported: Mr. HAUGEN. My understanding is that we have reached section 205, and the amendment is offered to section 204; if so, the amendment is out of order.

Mr. KINCHELOE. We have passed that section, and we are now on section 205.

Mr. HAUGEN. The amendment is to section 204, and we are now considering section 205.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman from Mississippi gave notice that he would offer the amendment, but he did not do so when we reached it.

The CHAIRMAN. That objection, of course, is good, and the point of order is sustained .

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE III .- STOCKYARDS.

SEC. 301. When used in this act—

(a) The term "stockyard owner" means any person engaged in the business of conducting or operating a stockyard;

(b) The term "stockyard services" means services or facilities furnished at a stockyard in connection with the receiving, marketing, feeding, watering, holding, delivery, shipment, weighing, or handling, in commerce, of live stock;

(c) The term "market agency" means any person engaged in the business of (1) buying or selling in commerce live stock at a stockyard on a commission basis, or (2) furnishing stockyard services; and

(d) The term "dealer" means any person, not a market agency, engaged in the business of buying or selling in commerce live stock at a stockyard, either on his own account or as the employee or agent of the vendor or purchaser.

Mr. Chairman, Loffer the following amend-

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Herrick: Page 11, after line 21, insert "Any person doing a commission business shall furnish his customer with an itemized list with all property sold upon his behalf, setting forth to whom sold, the price paid for each different lot, with the grade of each lot. This must be certified to by the purchaser or purchaser's agent.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am offering this amendment with this thought in view: Shippers should be enabled to check up on commission men. Now, I reside in Oklahoma and run a little ranch, and occasionally I have shipped a carload of cattle to Oklahoma City. I consigned them to English & Co. I got from English & Co. a little list of so many steers weighing so much, so many cows, so many heifers, so many veals, and so forth, sold to Wilson & Co. Well, this list gave me no insight whatever as to the prices these commission men should have received for each particu-I had one little experience: I had one lot of exceptionally fine steers, quoted on the market at 9 cents a pound. Now, the balance of that lot were what you would call heretics, or rather poor stock, and those were quoted at 6 cents a pound. When those returns came in those that I hardly expected anything for were quoted at 9 cents a pound and those that I had every reason to expect 9 cents a pound from these commission men claimed to have sold at 6 cents. Now, under my amendment the price actually paid would have been ascertained from Wilson & Co. As it was, I was holding a big sack full of hot air. But what could I do? I had no recourse, and it occurs to me that if this amendment were adopted it would allow me and other shippers in the future to ascertain whether we are getting correct returns or not. That is all I care to say. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the bill, I think, clearly provides for the very thing suggested by the gentleman from Oklahoma. The schedule shall be filed with the Secretary, he is authorized to prescribe what the schedules should be, and he has a right to suspend schedules. If he finds it necessary to do the thing suggested, it can be done under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HERRICK. I would like to have a vote on it, anyway. Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, I did not have time to prepare a minority report on the Longworth ad interim resolution, but I have since prepared a brief statement which I would like to have printed in the RECORD, and I ask that permission.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a certain statement which he has prepared regarding the ad interim resolution on the tariff. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Reserving the right to object, when was that resolution reported to the calendar?

Mr. YOUNG. I would say something like six or eight days

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the statement referred to:

To the Republican conference of House Members:

The following is the statement referred to:

To the Republican conference of House Members:

As I did not file a minority report in respect to the Longworth ad interim bill, permit me to give in brief some of the reasons which caused me to disagree with my colleagues of the Ways and Means Committee, all of whom are held by me in high esteem.

What is the Longworth resolution? It proposes in order to safeguard the public revenue to at once place in operation all rates of duty and such other provisions as shall be mentioned in the emergency clause of the permanent tariff bill now being prepared the day after it shall have been reported to the House, and without waiting for its approval by the House or the Senate or the President.

My belief is that the Republican conference should not support the Longworth resolution without giving careful thought to several phases of the question, among them the following:

First, it passed, will it have the force of law? The decisions of the United States Supreme Court are a unit upon the proposition that the Congress can not delegate legislative authority. Is the preparation of a tariff bill containing hundreds of items of customs duties, together with other provisions in respect thereto, a legislative function or an administrative function? The question should be easy to answer, but if anyone has difficulty with it the whole subject will be found illuminated by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Field against Clark, 143 United States Supreme Court in the case of Field against Clark, 143 United States Supreme Court in the case of Field against clark, and the subject will be found illuminated by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Field against clark, and the subject will be found illuminated by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Field against clark, and the subject will be found illuminated by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Field against clark, and the subject win only economic considerations but possible complications with foreign countries?

Fifth, the statement that Great Britain, her colonies, and France have done what is now proposed here should be taken with a grain of salt. In these countries what is called "the Government" is given power to make duties when reported to the legislative body immediately effective, but it should be remembered that these countries have what is called a directly responsible ministry or government, which can hold office only at the pleasure of the popularly elected branch of the legislature, and can be voted out of office promptly if they report customs rates or provisions which are unsatisfactory; also that their so-called government or ministry is charged with the executive function and responsibility, whereas cur Ways and Means Committee has no executive responsibility. It should also be remembered that the Senate of Canada is not elected, nor are the members of the British House of Lords, and those bodies have been practically stripped of all power over fiscal legislation.

If the members of the Republican conference desire to place the rates of the general tariff bill in force in advance of the time when the bill shall be finally passed, it can be done by the passage of a joint resolution introduced at the same time. True, it might require some time to do this, but should we accept instead the proposal to blindfold all Senators and Representatives who do not happen to belong to the Ways and Means Committee?

Yours, respectfully,

George M. Young,

GEORGE M. YOUNG, Representative Second District, North Dakota.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 31, 1921.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HERRICK].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were-ayes 6, noes 23.

So the amendment was rejected. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 302. (a) When used in this title the term "stockyard" means any place, establishment, or facility commonly known as stockyards, conducted or operated for compensation or profit as a public market, consisting of pens, or other inclosures, and their apurtenances, in which live cattle, sheep, swine, horses, mules, or goats are received, held, or kept for sale or shipment in commerce. This title shall not apply to a stockyard of which the area normally available for handling live stock, exclusive of runs, alleys, or passageways, is less than 20,000 square feet.

(b) The Secretary shall from the stock of the stock of the secretary shall from the stock of the secretary shall from the stock of the secretary shall from the stock of the stock of the secretary shall from the stock of the secretary shall from the stock of the secretary shall from the stock of the stock square feet.

(b) The Secretary shall from time to time ascertain, after such inquiry as he deems necessary, the stockyards which come within the foregoing definition, and shall give notice thereof to the stockyard owners concerned, and give public notice thereof by posting copies of such notice in the stockyard, and in such other manner as he may determine. After the giving of such notice to the stockyard owner and to the public, the stockyard shall remain subject to the provisions of this title until like notice is given by the Secretary that such stockyard no longer comes within the foregoing definition.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to correct the spelling of the word "appurtenances," in line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PURNELL; Page 12, line 7, correct the spelling of the word "appurtenances."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 311. Whenever, in any investigation under the provisions of this title or in any investigation instituted by petition of the stockyard owner or market agency concerned, which petition is hereby authorized to be filed, the Secretary, after full hearing, finds that any rate, charge, regulation, or practice of any stockyard owner or market agency, for or in connection with the receiving, marketing, feeding, holding, delivery, shipment, weighing, or handling, not in commerce, of live stock causes any undue or unreasonable advantage, prejudice, or preference as between persons or localities in intrastate commerce in live stock on the one hand and interstate or foreign commerce in live stock on the other hand, or any undue, unjust, or unreasonable discrimination against interstate or foreign commerce in live stock on the other hand, or any undue, unjust, or unreasonable discrimination against interstate or foreign commerce in live stock, which is kereby forbidden and declared to be unlawful, the Secretary shall prescribe the rate, charge, regulation, or practice thereafter to be observed, in such manner as, in his judgment, will remove such advantage, preference, or discrimination. Such rates, charges, regulations, or practices shall be observed while in effect by the stockyard owners or market agencies parties to such proceeding affected thereby, the law of any State or the decision or order of any State authority to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. PARRISH, Mr. HUDSPETH, and Mr. SANDERS of

Mr. PARRISH, Mr. HUDSPETH, and Mr. SANDERS of Indiana rose

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDSPETH: Page 22, line 1, strike out

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a perfecting amendment

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Parrish] offers a perfecting amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Parrish: Page 22, line 19, after the word "crimination," strike out the period and the balance of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, however, That full faith and credit shall be given all rates, laws, or regulations made by any State or its agencies or under its authority, and the orders and findings of the Secretary shall have the effect only of authorizing the Secretary or other interested party to institute suit in the proper court for the annulment of any such State rates, laws, or regulations under the general law."

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in favor of some legislation that will control the packers and protect the people from the many abuses they have undoubtedly suffered in the past at the hands of those engaged in the packing industry, and while this bill is not what I desire and contains a number of objectionable features, yet I shall vote for it. Before I do this, however, I shall make a most earnest effort to get the House to eliminate at least one of the most objectionable features. The amendment I have offered will remove this objection, and it strikes from the bill the following, appearing on page 52, beginning with line 19:

Such rates, charges, regulations, or practices shall be observed while in effect by the stockyard owners or market agencies parties to such proceeding affected thereby, the law of any State or the decision or order of any State authority to the contrary notwithstanding.

And inserts in lieu thereof the following proviso:

Provided, however, That full faith and credit shall be given all rates, laws, or regulations made by any State or its agencies or at its authority, and the orders and findings of the Secretary shall have the effect only of authorizing the Secretary or other interested party to institute suit in the proper court for the annulment of any such State rates, laws, or regulations under the general law.

The purpose of this amendment is to give full faith and credit to the rates, laws, and regulations of the several States on matters arising wholly within the State. It would not nullify the provisions of the bill in so far as it relates to interstate matters and when there arises a conflict between the orders made by the Secretary touching interstate rates, rules, and regulations on the one hand, and the rates, rules, and regulations made by any State or its agency on the other hand, then the amendment I offer would allow the Secretary of Agriculture or other interested party to go into the proper court and there have judicially determined the question as to which authority would control-that is, whether the matter at issue is an interstate question or whether it related wholly to the State.

This is a fair and just amendment and would save to the several States and their agencies the power and authority to deal with problems arising wholly within the States. The tendency of late is too much toward depriving the States and The their agencies of jurisdiction to function over local matters and to centralize in bureaus and commissions in Washington, in some instances 2,000 miles away from the people involved, full and complete authority. I am absolutely opposed to this tendency of centralizing authority in Washington and robbing the agencies of our States of power and authority to deal with purely State questions, and I sincerely trust that my amendment will be adopted and this objectionable feature will be eliminated from the bill.

I offered practically the same amendment that I am now offering to this bill to the transportation act when it was before Congress in November, 1919, and if my amendment had been adopted to the transportation act at that time we would not have seen the railroad commissions of 42 States of the Union going into court asking the courts of the country to return to them their power and jurisdiction over intrastate rates.

I believe in the preservation of the rights of the States, and I am strongly opposed to the tendency of centralizing so much power in the Interstate Commerce Commission at Washington. Such a tendency is fraught with many dangers, is inimical to the best interests of a truly democratic Government, and takes from the people the power to administer their own affairs in matters that are of a local nature.

If my amendment fails, I shall vote for a motion to recommit the bill eliminating this objectionable feature; and if we fail to eliminate it, then I shall nevertheless vote for the bill, because of the need, as I view it, for packer legislation at this It is seldom that we find a bill to which there are not some objections, and the best we can do is to weigh those things in favor of the bill against the objections and vote for what we believe on the whole to be best for the people whom we represent.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that my amendment will be adopted, and this very objectionable feature will be eliminated from the bill.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I did not charge anyone with not understanding, but some people do not want to understand. When a man says he favors a law to regulate the stockyards of this country, he does not necessarily mean that he thinks that that law must go to the extent of saying who shall own That is the only difference that I know of bethe stockyards. tween the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] and myself. The gentleman will come to that conclusion if he will examine the remarks I made. I never said that I thought it was necessary for the packers not to own them, and in response to that consent decree they have been unable to find some one else to own them. They are so much a part of the commerce of this country that, independent of who has the title to them, I have contended for years that they must be regulated, and I have never said anything in my life contrary to that proposition.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Certainly.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to ask the gentleman if he can regulate a piece of property that is owned, as we contend, by the packers, without divorcing it from them?

Mr. TINCHER. We regulate the railroads through the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if in the interstate commerce laws it is anywhere provided as to who shall own the stock in them, then I will agree that the gentleman is right.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Is the gentleman in favor of allowing them to control these stockyards and buy and sell to themselves? Is not the difference between "the gentleman from Kansas" and "the gentleman from Texas" this, that if this decree had been entered at the instance of the present able Attorney General, Mr. Daugherty, the gentleman would be satisfied with it?

Mr. TINCHER. Absolutely not at all. I served as a member of this committee for two years when we were trying to report out a bill. Probably the thing that made me mention the decree was this, that the Attorney General said to the committee, "I have a decree that will correct the evils," and it did not correct them; and we are now passing a law to do the thing that Attorney General Palmer said the decree would do, and that was to cure the evils that no Member of this House criticizes more severely than does the gentleman from Texas. said that as a preliminary to a statement in favor of this bill, and I repeat that there is not a Member of this Congress who is willing to take the decree as the law, as the Attorney General in the last administration asked the Committee on Agriculture to do in the last session of Congress; but on the other hand we will be practically unanimous in our vote to pass the law just as some of us tried to do in the last session of Congress.

Now, as to the amendment, perhaps I am not as good a partisan as my friend. In some things I am for State rights, and there are some things that I think the National Government ought to handle. As far as the dear old State of Texas is concerned, I do not know that I have any particular objection to your commission down there running your stockyards. But I have another neighbor, and that is the great State of Illinois, and I do not want the Illinois commission to run the Chicago stockyards. They are too big. I want the Secretary of Agriculture to run them. While they are located in the State of Illinois they affect every man, woman, and child in this country, because they handle a sufficient amount of the live-stock commerce in the Illinois stockyards so that it is no longer a State affair but a National affair, and I do not believe the State of Illinois has ever attempted by law to cure the evils that we are now attempting to cure by this bill. I do not know what law you have in Texas. I know Kansas has passed a law, and we have a commission, and that commission has been striving to regulate the stockyards, but they beat us to it there, because they have enough of their stockyards in the State of Missouri so that we can not regulate them.

Mr. HUDSPETH. We have a law in Texas fixing intrastate rates, and railroad rates in Texas were much lower when the State Railroad Commission of Texas fixed them than they have been since they have been fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. TINCHER. Well, I am not responsible for that, and I do not think the gentleman ought to blame us.

Mr. HUDSPETH. No; I do not.

Mr. TINCHER. And I do not think we ought to adopt a constitutional amendment because some of us are in favor of State

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to ask for an amendment of a bill that has been reported out by my committee, for which I expect to vote. I would not do so if it were an ordinary amendment, but I shall support the amendment of my colleague from Texas [Mr. Hudspeth]. Indeed, I have offered a similar amendment myself, which is now pending, because I believe that this section violates a principle of government that is as fundamental in political life as the Ten Commandments are in religious life, and that this bill goes just as far as it should be permitted to go in its first definition of commerce, on page 2, in which it takes control of a transaction that is wholly within the State if the cattle are later to be shipped to another State. That will enable the Secretary of Agriculture, through the powers conferred by this bill, to control any transaction that has a tinge of interstate commerce as one of its features. With that power given under the definition of commerce, which goes just as far as the Constitution of the United States will permit it to go, if not further, I do not believe it wise to have any part of section 311 in this bill, and I believe it will be just as good a bill and better with the amendment of my colleague adopted.

For instance, there may be a little stockyard in the State of Texas or in some other State that has to comply with the regulation of the State commission, and can go down to the State commission and present its facts or its position in hearings in that locality, and thus live and operate for the benefit of the people of that section without in any way interfering with the people of other sections; but if you require it to come 2,000 miles to the National Capital, its business will not be of such proportions as to enable it to come and make its position clear. After your definition of commerce in the first part of this bill, I do not see any reason for saying that all these intrastate matters shall be regulated by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.
Mr. ASWELL. What effect does the gentleman believe that amendment would have on the Chicago stockyards?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not think it would have any. Perhaps the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. Parrish] might have some effect in this, that if the State of Illinois had undertaken to go further than regulate its own commerce, and had attempted to regulate some interstate commerce, his amendment might permit that regulation to remain in force. But if you strike out this paragraph altogether, then if any acts of the local stockyard affect interstate commerce, if it is engaged in the handling of cattle to go into interstate commerce, this bill will cover it, and that is all you have a right to do under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman construe this section as absolutely stripping the State authorities of all right to regulate their intrastate business?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think it does, if the Secretary of Agriculture is disposed to take charge of the situation; at least he can go very far toward doing so.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was that the contemplation of the committee in favorably reporting the bill?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The members of the committee who defended this provision took the position that this did not change the control of State stockyards by the State; but I claim that by the definition, on page 2, you give authority to the Secretary of Agriculture on all matters that affect or pertain to interstate commerce, and that therefore there is no use for this section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH].

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH].

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CLAGUE offers to amend section 311 by striking out all of said ction 311, after the word "thereby," in line 22, insert a period, and adding the following substitute to the amendment offered by Mr.

PARRISH:

"The provisions of Title III herein shall not apply to any stockyard owner or market agency furnishing stockyard services at a stockyard in a State which now has or may hereafter establish an agency authorized and empowered to regulate stockyard services or the rates or charges made therefor or the regulations and practices in respect to furnishing stockyard services to be established, observed, or enforced by a stockyard owner in such stockyard; nor shall the provisions of Title III herein apply to any stockyard owner, market agency, or dealer in a stockyard in a State which has or may hereafter establish an agency authorized and empowered to regulate the practices or devices used or employed by such stockyard owner, market agency, or dealer in such stockyard: Provided, That this section shall not be held to limit the application of Title III herein to any stockyard owner, market agency, or dealer in respect to any matter of regulation not within the authority of such agency."

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I fully agree with the gentleman from Texas that the State should preserve some of the rights that they are entitled to. In the State of Minnesota the right to regulate stockyards is given to the railroad and warehouse commission. South St. Paul, Minn., has the fourth largest stockyard in the United States and the fourth largest in the world. In 1920 there were States and the fourth largest in the works over 4,000,000 head of stock handled at that yard. Prior to the total management of the state regulation whatever. The conditions there were intolerable, but the legislature in 1919 put in State regulations and the whole powers were given to the railroad and warehouse commissioners, and to-day the farmers of the State are wonderfully pleased with the service that we are re-We have over 600 cooperative associations, and these cooperative associations represent in a way nearly 300,000 farmers. These men are unanimous in leaving the regulation of our stockyards where they are to-day, and for this reason: That if a man goes to a stockyard with a carload of stock and has some trouble, the farmer at once goes before the commission or the man in charge and these conditions are remedied and the man goes home satisfied. But you bring these regula-tions to Washington and we will then have the same conditions that we have in the grain grades. The farmers of Minnesota and North Dakota and Montana prior to a few years ago wanted Federal regulation of grain grades. What has been the result? The result is that it has lost millions of dollars to our farmers. I do not mean to say that the Secretary of Agriculture would not be fair. He would, but he is too far away to give prompt and efficient service.

Now, in Minnesota our stock is weighed by State weighers and conditions of the stockyards are looked after by people living there, under State supervision. If you have trouble, you do not have to come clear to Washington to get relief. I do not care particularly whether you vote for my substitute or the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. My contention is that the State should have some rights in regulating the stockyards where they properly do it. My amendment preserves the bill intact, for if it is not regulated by the States the bill properly protects it by Federal regulation. This bill, in my opinion, is a splendid bill and should be adopted largely, but each State should have the right to regulate the stockyards within its own boundary where it can be properly and well done. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CLAGUE. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. I could not carry in my mind the language of the gentleman's substitute, but it occurs to me that if the substitute is adopted any State might possibly thwart the purpose of the bill by bogus legislation.

Mr. CLAGUE. I do not think so; there is a provision in my amendment that no phony regulation goes whatever.

Mr. PURNELL. But who is to determine whether the specific legislation is phony or real?

Mr. CLAGUE. I think the people of the State would determine that.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Yes. Mr. CLAGUE.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Along that same line, suppose the Legislature of Illinois should pass some kind of a bill-what has been called a phony bill-for the purpose of regulating the stockyards but which did not regulate. Then, any provision that the Secretary of Agriculture might make in reference to the stockyards which was in conflict with the laws of the State would be nullified.

Mr. CLAGUE. I doubt that. Mr. PARRISH. My amendment would take care of that. Under my amendment the Secretary of Agriculture would have the authority to go into court and enforce his decree.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order by the gentleman from Indiana is overruled. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the perfecting amendment by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH]

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PARRISH) there were 35 ayes and 56 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Hudspeth] to strike out the section.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Hudspeth) there were 36 ayes and 62 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 313. Except as otherwise provided in this act, all orders of the Secretary under this title, other than orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time, not less than five days, as is prescribed in the order, and shall continue in force until his further order, or for a specified period of time, according as is prescribed in the order, unless such order is suspended or modified or set aside by the Secretary or is suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction. petent jurisdiction.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Blanton: Page 23, line 14, after the word "money," strike out the following language, to wit, "shall take effect within such reasonable time."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, that provision, "shall take effect within such reasonable time," ought to apply to every desired piece of legislation, but by reason of our experience in the last Congress and in this Congress I have come to the conclusion that it is futile for us or for the people to expect that desired legislation shall take effect within a reasonable time. I note that this bill which we are to pass now in a very few moments is numbered 6320. In other words, during the short time that this Congress had been in session up to the date this bill was introduced, which was May 18, 1921, we had introduced 6,320 proposed measures. I want to congratulate the chairman of this committee, which is not the largest committee in the House, although it is a large one-for since the appropriating power has been taken away from it it is not as large a committee as it used to be—upon the fact that he has had sufficient power, although the bill was introduced only on May 18, to get it up and pass it before the end of the month of May, because he will pass it this evening. I notice that the chairman of a larger committee, the largest committee in Congress, the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], on the very opening day of this Congress introduced a measure which was so very important in his mind that he caused it to be numbered House bill No. 1, which is a bill to properly adjust the compensation of the veterans of the World War, but that bill has been lying idle, so far as the Congress knows, since we met. All these other thousands of bills apparently come in ahead of it. I want to know why it is that the greatest chairman of the greatest committee of the greatest Congress of the greatest Nation in the world can not get that bill up and pass it? So far as the rest of us know, he has not even made a report on it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; if the gentleman can answer the ques-

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I can. The subject matter of that bill and other kindred bills has all been combined in a bill which was reported last week from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which embraces the entire sub-ject matter of amendments to the war risk insurance act and the combining of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the Board for Vocational Education and the Health Service in so far as they apply to soldiers. The bill has been reported favorably.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is very ingenious. He is able, and he is doing the best he can for his He is strenuously trying to defend his party and I do not blame him. I probably would be doing the same thing if I were in his place, but his long-winded, attempted explanation does not answer. He could have found the answer in the one word that preceded the language which I have moved to strike out. What is the word? Look at the bill and you will see that my amendment follows the word "money." It is money that has kept this bill from passing, it is the money that you would have to take out of the pockets of the war profiteers to pay the adjusted compensation to the veterans of the World War, that has stopped the passage of this Fordney That is what has kept that bill from passing. Are you not willing to take it-the necessary money from the war profiteers? I am; I do not care how far down into their pockets it digs. It should come from the war lords who profited by the war. I am willing to take it, because it is a just debt we owe to the soldier boys, who brought victory home from France for that flag which has never yet suffered defeat. What is keeping you from taking the money? It is the fear of some rich constituents at home. We are willing to call our soldier boys out when an emergency arises. We force them from their business and their families to go to the trenches, and when they come back with a victory, we forget them. This bill has been pending all of last Congress and all of this and has not become a law yet. It is the fault of this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, Mr. Chairman, that was a pro forma amendment, and I offered it to be able to make some remarks. withdraw the pro forma amendment,

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows: Sec. 314. (a) Any stockyard owner, market agency, or dealer who knowingly fails to obey any order made under the provisions of section 310, 311, or 312 shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500 for each offense. Each distinct violation shall be a separate offense, and in case of a continuing violation each day shall be deemed a separate offense. Such forfeiture shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States.

(b) It shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney General, to prosecute for the recovery of forfeitures. The costs and expense of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Amendment offered by Mr. Herrick: Page 23, line 22, strike out the word "knowingly."

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there is not much to be said upon this amendment, but it occurs to me that it is an awfully foolish word to put into an important piece of legislation like this, because it is a well-known fact that any big commercial enterprise has highly paid attorneys to advise it what the law is. They do not pretend to try to keep up with the law themselves, but they pay out their good money for that service. If they do not get the service it is not the fault of this Congress: it is their own fault in selecting their attorney. Therefore it is highly unnecessary for us to worry about whether they know what the law is. The thing for us to do is to make the law and let them hire their attorney to tell them what the law is. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERRICK. Yes. Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman understands that this law does not relate only to the stockyards of Chicago, but it might relate to a small stockyard in Oklahoma.

Mr. HERRICK. Oh, I realize that; but there are a few local attorneys there, too, and they would be very glad to get a small fee. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 405. Nothing contained in this act, except as otherwise provided herein, shall be construed—

(a) To prevent or interfere with the enforcement of or the procedure under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, the interstate commerce act as amended, the act entitled "An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes," approved April 10, 1918, or sections 73 to 77, inclusive, of the act of August 27, 1894, entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," as amended by the act entitled "An act to amend sections 73 and 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,' approved February 12, 1913," or (b) To alter, modify, or repeal such acts or any part or parts thereof, or

(c) To prevent or interfere with any investigation, proceeding, or prosecution begun and pending at the time this act becomes effective.

(c) To prevent or interfere with any investigation, proceeding, or prosecution begun and pending at the time this act becomes effective.

Mr. WINGO, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In section 202 of the bill we undertake to say what is unlawful. The section that has just been read provides that nothing contained in the act, except as otherwise provided therein, shall be construed to prevent or interfere with the enforcement of or the procedure under certain acts, including the antitrust acts. Does the committee take the position that this act is cumulative, and even after it is passed that a packer might be prosecuted under the Sherman Antitrust Act?

Mr. HAUGEN. It does. Mr. WINGO. What about the Clayton Act? Does the committee intend to make this cover the law so far as the packers are concerned, punishing them for engaging in any unfair, unjust, discriminatory, or deceptive practice, or in combinations that are in restraint of trade or commerce? Is it intended that this act is the one under which they shall be prosecuted, or that the Government has a choice, through the Attorney Gen-eral, of having them indicted under the Sherman antitrust law, or of having the Secretary of Agriculture proceed under this act? Which is intended?

Mr. HAUGEN. Our idea is that they will be prosecuted under this act, but there is nothing to hinder their being prosecuted under any other act for anything made unlawful in other acts.

Mr. WINGO. I am not complaining; I simply wanted to get it clear. If this bill becomes a law, the packers will be indicted in the district court of the United States, and at the same time the Secretary of Agriculture might go ahead and start proceedings and hearings. Is that contemplated?

Mr. HAUGEN. That might be done, but we must expect cooperation between the departments.

Mr. WINGO. I am talking about the legal possibilities now. Mr. HAUGEN. They can be prosecuted under the act. Mr. WINGO. This act undertakes to make unlawful some things made unlawful by present existing law, does it not?

Mr. HAUGEN. It does.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman take the position—I am trying to find out—that this would not repeal, that when you undertake to cover the same act and make it unlawful it is not intended thereby for the courts to take up that subject and repeal by implication existing law?

Mr. HAUGEN. Whatever the Secretary finds to be an unlawful act

Mr. WINGO. No; this is what you do, and I am not com-plaining about it. Of course, you can not obligate the Secretary of Agriculture

Mr. WINGO. No; you do not do that. You start out with the general proposition, declaring in a general way what is un-Then, in order to meet the decision of the Supreme Court in the Lever case, I presume you provide that where the packer indulges in certain practices, then the question of whether or not it comes within the inhibition of the law is one that is tried. You have a hearing. The packer is heard and it is finally determined, and he does not like the decision of the Secretary, and he appeals to the court. The court determines it.

Then, thereafter he can be prosecuted for a violation of the order, because he has violated that which in a judicial proceeding has been determined to be an act that belongs to that class that Congress has made unlawful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. The Secretary would ascertain and determine, of course, subject to the review of the court.

Mr. WINGO. But here is the point I am trying to get at, and it has bothered several of the lawyers in the House. undertake to take up certain things and say they are unlawful, because they are unlawful under the terms of this bill. In other words, Congress has already covered the question. Now, your familiar rule of interpretation comes in that the courts frequently adopt where Congress undertakes to cover a matter whereby it by implication repeals a law covering that matter. Now, did the committee decide that there was anything in this act to repeal any of the existing antitrust laws? Was it the judgment of the committee that they repealed any at all?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If there was a direct conflict be-tween the statutes the last statute would repeal the former, but if there was not a conflict the various statutes would be construed together.

Mr. WINGO. They would both be construed together, and where a reasonable decision could be based that would give the right to both acts they would both stand. What is the law with reference to the packers when you get through with this bill? Can they be indicted under the present existing law, because you say it is not intended to repeal the antitrust law? Are you simply making confusion worse confounded? Are you undertaking to clarify the question of regulation and restraint of the packers? That is the question that ought to appeal to you if you do not do it. Does this law run parallel, and in some instances it is identical with the statutes upon the statute books; but, instead of leaving it to the courts to enforce the act, you say that the man shall not be prosecuted for it until the Secretary has taken evidence and finds that he has committed some act that he has made an order against, and then thereafter you are not going to punish him for the act but you are going to punish him because he violates an order. In other words, you are going to have a criminal law for which he can be prosecuted, and then another law for which you are penalizing him if he violates an order inhibiting him from doing something that is unlawful under the antitrust laws. In other words, you are going to have a double-barreled proceeding. I have great deference for the gentleman's legal learning, and therefore I am asking him the question,

Mr. HAUGEN. Not at all; I am not a lawyer. Mr. WINGO. I thought the gentleman wrote the bill and was a lawyer.

Mr. HAUGEN. We had very able legal assistance.

Mr. WINGO. I am sure of it. I want to be complimentary to the gentleman.

Mr. HAUGEN. But it does not take a lawyer to construe this bill as far as that goes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield-Mr. HAUGEN. Is it possible——

Mr. WINGO. Because the gentleman is getting into too deep water in discussing an academic question. This bill raises these legal questions, and you never can tell what this bill does until you have tried it.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman is a lawyer?

Mr. WINGO. I am. Mr. HAUGEN. The violation of the Sherman Act is one thing and the violation of the Secretary's order under this would be another thing. They can be punished for violating an order of the Secretary or punished for violating the anti-trust act or any other law. What this bill provides for is simply setting up the machinery to see that they obey the law; if not, that they will be prosecuted.

Mr. WINGO. You are setting up machinery to see that the courts do their duty?

The gentleman says you are going to make another crime; that is, violating an order. I do not think the gentleman's bill does that, although that criticism would lie. I covered that But you would fall into the very error which you are afraid of, by saying you are going to create another crime by violating an order and not doing all the unlawful things on which the order was predicated. That is, to restrain them from doing the unlawful thing?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WINGO. I just asked for information, and I got it.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Towner, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 6320, had instructed him to report the same to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed copy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the reading of the engrossed copy. Of course, the engrossed copy is not here.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. Wurzbach, for one week, on account of business.

To Mr. Crowther, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. Leatherwood, for two days, May 31 and June 1, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. COLLINS. I make the same request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the same request. Is there objection to the requests? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I have shown great forbearance in not talking on this bill. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The lady from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend her remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate 16 resolutions of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, as follows:

United States of America, Territory of Alaska, Office of the Secretary for the Territory.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY FOR THE TERRITORY.

I, R. J. Sommers, secretary of the Territory of Alaska, do hereby certify that the hereto attached copy of house memorial No. 1 is a full, true, and correct copy of the original now on file in this office of house memorial No. 1, as passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska at its fifth session in the year 1921.

House memorial 1, in the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, fifth

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully represent that—
Whereas it is a fact conceded by all observers, even the most casual, that there has been for many years a constant diminution in the run of salmon of all kinds in the Territory of Alaska, amounting in many of the best salmon streams to depletion; and Whereas the remedy for this situation must be adequate and yet least burdensome to the large number of our permanent population; and Whereas thousands of the white and native population of Alaska are almost entirely dependent on their fishing operations for their living and support; and
Whereas a large number of fine salmon streams are practically blocked by traps, even though they are legally placed, on account of topography and the habit of salmon to enter streams by fellowing an almost invariable course, which has resulted in the depletion of many fine streams; and

Whereas the traps now catch millions of salmon and fish of all kinds, and catch them regardless of weather conditions, and also catch the salmon during the 24 hours of each day while the traps, placed as they are, across the path of the salmon on their way to the spawning grounds, catch with relentless efficiency nearly every fish that follows this path, whether swimming singly or in schools; and Whereas it has been proven that it is impossible to regulate these traps which violate the law constantly by fishing during the closed periods and few culprits are brought to justice; and Whereas it is also a well-known fact that seiners frequently "rob the creek" in such a way that it is admitted by all, including the fishermen and the Bureau of Fisheries or their deputies, that the present system of law enforcement is entirely inadequate: Therefore be it Resolved, That, beginning with the year January 1, 1922, all traps system of law enforcement is entirely inadequate: Therefore be it Resolved, That, beginning with the year January 1, 1922, all traps shall be at least 5,280 feet from outside points to the entrance of all bays containing salmon streams, and that the distance between all traps in any one direction shall be 5,280 feet; and all seines be not more than 150 fathoms in length and not less than 6 fathoms nor more than 12 fathoms deep, this being a necessary step to preserve the fishing industry; and be it further

Resolved, The following fishing regulations be enacted:

That there be a weekly closed season, beginning 12 m. Friday of each week and ending 6 a. m. the Monday following;

That deputy wardens be given a district to patrol, over which they must travel at irregular intervals, covering their beat at least twice a week;

must travel at irregular intervals, covering their beat at least twice a week;

That at each important stream there be placed a deputy warden to serve with or without pay, and only during the time when the salmon are running; that the deputy shall have the qualifications of being a bona fide resident of Alaska;

That every fisherman shall be required to carry a license to fish, and that said license be granted only to full citizens of the United States and to the inhabitants of Annette Island;

That said license be suspended for 30 days for the first offense or violation of the fishing regulations and suspended for a period of one year for the second offense and revoked in perpetuity for the third offense, and in addition to suspension or revocation of license all gear used in illegal fishing shall be subject to confiscation, and that each warden or deputy be authorized to act summarily in taking up the license, permitting the holder to have redress in the district court; be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States place the control of the fishing business of Alaska in the hands and under the control of the Indistrict of the Territory of Alaska;

Resolved further by the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, That a copy hereof be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the United States senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the Hon. Dax Sutheriand, Delegate to the House of Representatives, the Hon. Dax Sutheriand, Delegate to the House of Representatives from Alaska, and to the Secretary of Commerce.

United States of America, Territory of Alaska, Office of the Secretary for the Territory,

I, R. J. Sommers, secretary of the Territory of Alaska, do hereby certify that the hereto attached copy of house joint memorial No. 4 is a full, true, and correct copy of the original now on file in this office of house joint memorial No. 4 as passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska at its fifth session in the year 1921.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the Territory of Alaska, at Juneau, the capital, this 17th day of May, A. D. 1921.

R. J. SOMMERS, Secretary of Alaska.

House joint memorial 4, in the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, fifth session.

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in fifth regular session assembled, do most respectfully and earnestly represent that—whereas Bethel is the head of ocean navigation and the lower terminus of river navigation on the Kuskokwim River in Alaska, and is the matural outlet for a country proven to be exceedingly rich in precious metals, as well as in many other natural resources, the development of which country is dependent upon the development of the necessary means of communication; and

Whereas Haycock is the center of the valley of the Koyuk, rich in placer gold and timber, which already has a population of more than 100 white pioneers; and the nearest point of communication is a telephone station at Cheenik, 125 miles distant, which is reached only by dog teams during the winter and by river and ocean voyage in the summer trimonthly, while during the spring and fall traveling either by land or by water is impossible on account of ice conditions; and whereas Kotzebue is the head of ocean navigation and the lower terminus of river navigation of the Noatak, Kobuk, and Selawik Rivers; it is the natural outlet for a country rich in minerals and furs, and will soon be an important export station for reindeer meat;

whereas Seldovia, on Cooks Inlet, in the center of a population numbering approximately 1,000 people, who are rapidly developing a farming and fishing industry in their vicinity; the mail service to and from Seldovia is inadequate and irregular, and the lack of means for dependable and regular communication has greatly retarded the industries of the country; and

Whereas as Teller is one of the most important ports on Seward Peninsula, is situated in the heart of a great mining and fishing district, and is without telephone or telegraphic communication, and owing to its central location is in position to command and protect a large portion of the coast line; and

Whereas Wiseman, situated on the head waters of the Koyukuk River, is the center of a population of an important and growing mining district, and has no means of telegraphic communication except through Fort Gibbon on the Yukon River more than 150 miles distant; and

Whereas Katalla, situated on Katalla Bay, is situated in the center of a population of an important and growing oil and mining district and is inaccessible by both water and land for the greater part of the year.

We, therefore, your memorialists, urge that, as soon as possible, radio stations be established by the Government at the places above mentioned, to the end that the pioneer population which is now endeavoring to develop the various sections of the country referred to may be encouraged, aided, and supported in their efforts; and we respectfully urge that the outlay of the Government connected with such enterprise would be negligible, compared with the returns which would by such course accrue to the country.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

House joint memorial 6, in the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, fifth session.

To the President, the Congress, and the Secretary of the Interior of the United States:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully and earnestly represent that—respectfully and earnestly represent that—

Whereas ocean transportation between Alaska and the States during recent years has so greatly decreased in efficiency and increased in the expense to the traveling and shipping public that the industries of the Territory throughout have become paralyzed and are in danger of extinction; and
Whereas the private companies now engaged in the transportation business between Alaska and the States have shown themselves either unwilling or unable to furnish those transportation facilities which are absolutely necessary to the growth of the industries of the Territory; and are absolutely necessary to the growth of the industries of the Territory; and

Whereas the high cost of transportation and the inefficiency of the present system to supply the needs of the country have so crippled the industries as to drive a large percentage of the white population out of the Territory, and threaten the industries thereof with extinction; and Whereas the financial resources of the Territory have so diminished that it will be impossible for the Territorial legislature to raise the necessary funds locally with which to supply the needs of better transportation facilities;

New therefore we your memorialists correctly near that Federal

Now, therefore, we, your memorialists, earnestly pray that Federal aid may be extended to this Territory to maintain continuous and reliable routes of transportation at such cost to the public as would tend to revive the vanishing industries of the Territory; be it Resolved by the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, That copies of this memorial be furnished to the President and to the Congress of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Delegate to Congress from Alaska.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

House joint memorial 12, in the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, fifth session.

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully present to you the following facts:

1. That much of the placer-mining ground in Alaska is workable only by dredging or hydraulicking, and large groups of claims must for such purpose be secured by the same owner before the expense of installing the necessary machinery can be incurred.

2. That no development work on each claim is needed or of any value after the claim has been prospected, and under the present rulings of the Interior Department work done on one claim by way of extracting minerals therefrom will not for the purpose of patent proceedings be accepted as done on the group unless it can be shown to have been of value in developing each claim. This feature of the law has deterred owners from applying for patent, with the result that the Government has been deprived of funds which it otherwise would have derived from patent proceedings, and the title to much mining ground has remained unsettled.

Wherefore we your memorialists connectly recommend that the law

Mained unsettled.

Wherefore, we, your memorialists, earnestly recommend that the law be so changed that actual work in mining of one or more placer claims in the group be accepted as performed for all the claims in the group, where such claims are so situated that they can be worked successfully only by dredging or hydraulicking.

And your memorialists will every pray.

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully present to you the following facts:

1. That a large number of mining claims in Alaska are so situated that the annual labor required to be performed upon them is of no value in the developing or prospecting of the ground, and such expenditure upon such claims is an absolute waste and serves no purpose except to technically comply with the law.

2. That after the ground has been prospected, the owners may have to delay the actual mining operations until roads are built, so that dredges or other machinery can be transported to the premises, for which reason roads are often a prerequisite to the commencement of productive mining.

Now, therefore, we, your memorialists, respectfully recommend that owners of mining claims, in lieu of the annual labor required to be performed, be permitted to pay $100 for each claim to the clerk of the district court in the division wherein the claim is situated to be by him transmitted to the Territorial road commission and to be by the latter expended for construction or maintenance of roads in the recording precinct in which the claim is situated; and we firmly believe that such change in the law will materially aid in the speedier development of many mining regions.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

And pour memorialists will ever pray.

House joint memorial 14, in the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, fifth session.

o the honorable the President, the Senate, the House of Representa-tives, the Secretary of War, and the Chief of Engineers of the United States:

Your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Territory of Alaska, do respectfully submit the following for your consideration:

sideration:
That the Alaska Road Commission since its creation under the act of Congress approved January 27, 1905, has constructed approximately 5,000 miles of military and post roads and trails in all sections of the Territory of Alaska.

That such construction has resulted in great benefit to the country and has aided greatly in developing the various sections of our Territory.
That these roads and trails are not merely of local importance, but they form a well-balanced system of communication planned to serve the entire Territory.

That the expenses incurred in such road and trail building are detrayed by an annual appropriation made by the honorable the Congress of the United States and by a portion of what is known as the "Alaska fund" and other moneys contributed from various sources.

That due to the curtailed appropriations during the war period sufficient funds were not available for ordinary maintenance, as a result of which considerable deterioration has resulted. Furthermore, the system as a whole has not been completed, so that many routes can not be utilized throughout without breaking loads, due to uncompleted intermediate sections.

utilized throughout without breaking loads, due to uncompleted intermediate sections.

That the newly organized Alaska Road Commission has now completed an investigation of the entire system, and as a result submitted estimate for $955,000 for the next fiscal year for the rehabilitation, repair, and improvement of the system.

That the Government railroad, now nearing completion, will need a system of feeder roads and trails in order to provide traffic. The Alaska Road Commission contemplates the completion of a system of such feeders, and one-half of the amount asked for will be expended on roads and trails directly tributary to the Government railroad.

That the restoration and construction of roads planned by the Alaska Road Commission will greatly aid in relieving the hardship created by the rise in prices and the consequent cessation of gold mining.

That we indorse and approve the program of the Alaska Road Commission and consider it one of the most important steps projected for the development of Alaska.

In view of these facts, we respectfully request that the Congress in its consideration of the annual appropriation for the support of the Army, 1922, include at least the full amount of $955,000 in its item for the "construction, repair, and maintenance of military and post roads, bridges, and trails, Alaska," and, if possible, to increase the same, in order that substantial results may be obtained without disastrous delay, And your memorialists will ever pray.

Petition to the Congress of the United States for the appropriation of sufficient funds for the establishment and maintenance of an insane asylum and sanitarium within the Territory of Alaska for the purpose of caring for the insane of the Territory and the abolition of the present contract system at Morningside, near Portland, Oreg.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress of the United States assembled:

Your petitioners, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, represent

Your petitioners, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, represent as follows:

That the system now in vogue for caring for the insane of the Territory of Alaska under centract with an asylum and sanitarium located near Portland, Oreg., is, in our opinion, not conducive to the best results to the inmates, and that the present contract with the Morning-side Sanitarium Co., of Portland, Oreg., expires January 16, 1925.

Besides, we consider the contract system for caring for the mentally needy and helpless is the most inhuman and injultous that can be devised, since the contractors are too apt to have their eyes on the profits they may derive from such contract, and the commercial greed would outweigh the human love and Christian charity.

That there are many desirable places in Alaska where there are mineral hot springs which would be beneficial to such as are inmates of said institution, and where the climatic conditions are fully as favorable as those near Portland, Oreg.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the contract system for the caring of the insane of Alaska be abolished and that an institution for the care of the Alaska insane patients be established in Alaska at some convenient and desirable location, any number of which can be obtained, where the climate and facilities are conducive to the proper treatment, care, and welfare of the insane patients; and it is

Resolved by the Fifth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Alaska, That this petition be forwarded to the Congress of the United States with an urgent request that the same be given immediate consideration, and that immediate steps be taken for the abregation of the present contract system and for the establishment of an asylum and sanitarium for the insane in the Territory of Alaska. It is further

To the President of the United States, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the honorable Secretary of the Interior:

The Legislature of the Territory of Alaska assembled, respectfully represent that—

The revenues derived from the fur-seal rookerles of Alaska amount to more than $2,000,000 yearly and are increasing each year.

Since the treaty of 1911 went into effect with Japan and Great Britain protecting the seal herds, nearly $4,000,000 has accrued, leaving a large balance rightfully belonging to Alaska.

Alaska is receiving no part of the revenue derived from the fur-seal islands in Alaska, to which we are entitled, the same as from our forests.

Therefore your memorialists respectfully urge that 25 per cent of the net sum derived from the fur-seal industry and other revenues from said islands should be naid into the general fund of the Territory of Alaska for uses of the Territory; and be it further Resolved, That a like percentage derived from all other resources of said Territory not now allowed or provided for be allowed as our just share of the rightful wealth belonging to the Territory and be paid into our general fund.

Substitute senate joint memorial 4, in the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, fifth session.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in the Congress assembled and the honorable Secretary of the Interior:

The Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in regular session, respectfully represents that—

Lying along the coast of Alaska and extending from the Canadian boundary line some 2,000 miles far out in the Eastern Hemisphere there are hundreds of small islands, unsuited to agriculture and without improvements or inhabitants and seldom visited by any person except roaming natives and fishermen.

These islands are especially adapted for fox farming and stock raising, and a large number of them would be devoted to that use by the inhabitants of the Territory were they able to secure any valid possessory right to the same under the laws of the United States.

They now lie fallow and unimproved, because there is no provision of law by which they may be leased by the Secretary of the Interior, under whose jurisdiction they are, and many applications have been made for leasing of the same for the purpose of raising foxes and for stockraising purposes, but for lack of authority in the Department of the Interior such applications have been invariably refused by the departmental authorities.

Wherefore your petitioners urge that the Congress of the United States Senate joint memorial No. 7, in the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, fifth session.

To the honorable the President, the Senate, and House of Representa-tives of the United States:

tives of the United States:

Your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Territory of Alaska, submit for your consideration the organic act, approved August 4, 1912, providing for the incorporation of cities and towns in Alaska, which act does not allow municipalities to create a bonded indebtedness; prohibiting many needed improvements, such as public utilities, sewerage systems, and emergency problems, as the limit of taxation is fixed at 20 mills. The town of Seward, Alaska, with an assessed valuation of $1,300,000, is unable, from the revenues derived from taxation, to protect the town and Government property that is nontaxable from severe damages caused by the waters of Lowell Creek.

The residents of Seward, by their town council, have petitioned the Legislature of Alaska for aid, as given to the town of Valdez, Alaska, by Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved, That flowing out of a deep box canyon, running due east across the town of Seward, Alaska, a distance of approximately 1,600 feet, is a characteristic mountain glacial stream, designated as Lowell Creek; across the town of Seward, Alaska, a distance of approximately 1,600 feet, is a characteristic mountain glacial stream, designated as Lowell Creek;

That since the year 1903 the Alaska Central Reilway its successory.

That since the year 1903 the Alaska Central Railway, its successors in interest, now the Government railway project, have maintained near the mouth and outlet of said stream into the tidal waters of Resurrection Bay a short pile trestle, thereby obstructing the free flow of the waters of said Lowell Creek in times of ordinary water;

That during the last 17 years, since the obstruction of the mouth of said stream as aforesaid, in times of flood water, the silt, gravel, debris, and water carried in volume by said stream "backs up," has no outlet, fills old channels, overflows, and causes great damage to the property of the residents of said town of Seward; and, in time of extraordinary water, threatens the lives of said residents;

That by reason of said continued obstruction at the mouth of said stream the town of Seward, before incorporation in the year 1912 and since said date of incorporation, has been compelled to and has expended a sum approximating $50,000 in an effort to confine said stream in proper channels and prevent loss and destruction;

That under a plan now adopted by said town of Seward it is believed by an expenditure of $100,000 adequate protection will be afforded to the town, its people, and property contained therein.

Wherefore, your memorialists pray that the Congress of the United States grant Federal aid to be given to the said town of Seward, Alaska, to the extent of the sum of $100,000, to be expended in public works seeking to protect the lives, property, and railroad property from the ravages of Lowell Creek; the same to be expended under and by direction of some Engineer officer of the United States Army.

Senate joint memorial 8, in the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, fifth session.

To the honorable the Secretary of War, to the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, to the Congress of the United States, to the Delegate to Congress from Alaska:

To the honorable the Secretary of War, to the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, to the Congress of the United States, to the Delegate to Congress from Alaska:

We, your memorialists, respectfully present for your consideration and helpful assistance the following matters of grave importance to the Territory of Alaska:

(1) That Alaska is so situated that a proper and fairly expeditious mail service seems impossible of attainment, and that in consequence the people of the Territory are more dependent upon telegraphic service than are the people of any other part of the United States.

(2) That the War Department early in the development of Alaska laid cables and operated telegraph lines and radio stations to many parts of Alaska have been duly appreciative of the splendid work performed by the Signal Corps of the War Department and have supported the military cable and telegraph system to the extent of making it practically, and perhaps entirely, self-supporting.

(3) Now, however, it comes to the attention of your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska—

(a) That the present cable is in such a condition that only about one-tenth of the current applied at one end reaches the distant end. This condition would not be alarming if the low insulation existed in some particular piece of the cable, but, as a matter of fact, it is distributed throughout the entire length, making it impossible to bring the cable up to a reasonable insulation which would permit of duplexing.

(b) It has been down about 16 years and is very much in the category of a temporary railway that has served its purpose and has to give way to better construction.

(c) The number of breaks in the cable have increased during the past few years notwithstanding efforts to strengthen it by insertion of new cable in known weak spots. The cable ship has consequently been kept on repair work far out of proportion to that required of cable ships of commercial systems. Cable 48—Seattle-Sitka—Carries the bulk of the traffic between Seattl

To the honorable the President and the Congress of the United States:
We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in regular session assembled do most respectfully represent that—
Whereas our Government is spending over $50,000,000 in Alaska railroads, chiefly for the development of Alaska's mineral resources:
Whereas from the sea terminal of said railroad to the nearest markets in the United States the distance is some 1,200 miles by boat;
Whereas for many years past it has been impossible for those mines in Alaska not under the cwnership or control of some transportation or allied interest to secure dependable transportation for their ore to a smelter in the United States;
Whereas such mines have no adequate protection against extortion or dishonest practices at the smelter in the United States, even if they should get transportation for their ore thereto;
Whereas this condition has continued for many years and is now retarding the development of Alaska's resources; and is, in fact, industrial suppression;
Whereas the United States Bureau of Mines, through its representative, has reported adversely upon the location of a smelter-in Alaska;
Whereas the United States Geological Survey, in Bulletin 714A, by A. H. Brooks and G. C. Martin, pages 14, 56, 57, 60, call attention to the fact that the suppression of small or developing properties in Alaska is being accomplished through lack of transportation or refusal of smelters, even in war time, to treat the ore, and that ocean freight and passenger rates have been increased and the service decreased: Now, therefore, be it

Senate joint memorial 14, in the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, fifth session.

To the Congress of the United States:

To the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in fifth regular session assembled, respectfully represent that—

Whereas under the present law $100 worth of labor or improvements must be performed or made upon each lode or placer mining claim prior to the end of the year; and

Whereas a very large percentage of all the mining claims located in Alaska are situated hundreds of miles from settled communities or supply stations and in regions where the climatic conditions during the winter render it difficult and very expensive to secure the supplies for carrying on the operations; and

Whereas if the time within which such improvements must be performed expired on or about the list day of July of each year, it would be feasible for the owners of such claims to perform the assessment work for two years at one time, by reason of the fact that the assessment work must, of necessity, on account of the physical and climatic conditions, be performed in the summer season; and Whereas it is the general desire of the prospectors and miners in the Territory of Alaska that a change in the law be made, permitting the work to be done at any time before the 1st of July instead of before the 1st of January of each year;

Now, therefore, we, your memorialists, respectfully pray that a law be passed making the change herein suggested, so far as the Territory of Alaska is concerned.

And your memorialists will ever pray. Passed by the senate April 28, 1921.

Attest:

JOHN SUNDBACK, President of the Senate.

T. M. REED, Secretary of the Senate.

Passed by the house April 29, 1921.

Andrew Nerland, Speaker of the House.

JAMES P. DALY, Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Duluth, Minn., praying for the enactment of legislation to create a department of education, and remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to promote Americanization by providing for cooperation with the several States in the education of non-English-speaking persons and the assimilation of foreign-born residents, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BURSUM presented a resolution of Lee Rhoads Post, American Legion, of Tucumcari, N. Mex., favoring the exactment of legislation providing adequate relief for disabled exservice men, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a petition of Pierce County Pomona Grange, No. 16, of Puyallup, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit gambling in grain and other agricultural products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HARRIS presented a resolution adopted by the State convention Georgia League of Women Voters, at Augusta, Ga., May 14, 1921, favoring the reduction of armaments, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Southern States Phosphate & Fertilizer Co., of Augusta, Ga., praying for the enactment of legislation reducing freight rates on fertilizers, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of the Sloux City (Iowa) Live Stock Exchange, praying for the enactment of the so-called French-Capper truth-in-fabric bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of sundry members of Parker Grange, No. 1467, of Goodrich; sundry citizens of Hill City, Zurich, Douglass, Udall, Wichita, Clyde, Hollis, Aurora, and Delphos, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit gambling in grain and other agricultural products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Atchison, Kans., favoring the enactment of legislation providing adequate relief for disabled ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIS presented resolutions of the Youngstown Nest. No. 1636, Order of Owls, of Youngstown, and Cincinnati Association of Public School Teachers, of Cincinnati, both in the State of Ohio, favoring the enactment of legislation providing adequate relief for disabled ex-service men, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

FREIGHT RATES ON CITRUS FRUITS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I present a telegram from the Florida Citrus Exchange with regard to freight rates on citrus fruits, and I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAMPA, FLA., June 1, 1921.

Hon. Duncan U. Fletcher,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Understand rallway executives have introduced testimony to the effect movement perishables shows increase over last year notwithstanding increase in freight rates. This may or may not be correct. Government figures for Florida show 6,000 acres decrease watermelon planting this spring against last. However, granting increase movement citrus fruits, call attention this due to coming into bearing of thousands of acres young groves planted five to seven years ago.

It is indisputable fact, largest percentage Florida's citrus crop in its history was not shipped this last season, particularly lower grades of fruit, account not bringing sufficient price to justify expense of shipping. The vital question for consideration is not the volume moving but the net result to producers and their ability to continue production. No one can successfully challenge statement this has been most disastrous season for citrus-fruit producers in every citrus area of the United States in which increased freight rates have played the big part, Florida Citrus Exchange.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (S. 1935) granting certain lands to the State of Alabama for the use of the Searcy Hospital for the Colored Insane; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 1936) to amend certain seections of the Judicial Code relating to the Court of Claims, to regulate appeals therefrom, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 1937) providing for the relief of the United States Air Mail Hangar Holding Association of Salt Lake City, Utah; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. BURSUM:

A bill (S. 1938) for the quieting of the title to certain lands within Indian pueblo grants in the State of New Mexico; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 1939) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Georgia E. Morrison, administratrix of the estate of George Smith, deceased; to the Committee on Claims. By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 1940) waiving the age limit for transfer to the Regular United States Navy in the case of Lieut. Thomas G. Odell; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 1941) for the relief of the American Surety Co., of New York; to the Committee on Claims.

EXEMPTION OF FOREIGN SHIPOWNERS FROM TAXATION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Under our income tax laws there are certain cases where taxes are imposed on ships owned by foreigners resident abroad. Their Governments have not been imposing similar taxes on our people, but they are now threatening to do so. I introduce a bill putting them on an equality with our own people, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 1942) to encourage the American merchant marine by securing for it an exemption from foreign income and excess-profits taxation in return for a like exemption from taxation granted to foreign shipowners was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CAPPER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 33, line 11, after the word "Army," strike out down to and including "automobiles," in line 18, on the same page, and insert the following: "And provided further, That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to dispose of, by transfer to the Post Office Department under existing laws and by sale, 2,000 three-quarter ton motor trucks for use in the Postal Service.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On May 27, 1921:

S. 535. An act relating to the landing and operation of submarine cables in the United States.

On May 31, 1921:

S. 82. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North, at or near the city of Pembina, N. Dak.

JOINT COMMISSION OF AGRICULTURAL INQUIRY.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, on yesterday I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate concurrent resolution No. 4 was agreed to, the resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] providing for the investigation which that resolution proposes. I wish to ask unanimous consent to withdraw that motion. I desire to say in doing it that I believe the investigation will be utterly futile, that it will result in the expenditure of large sums of money, and will accomplish absolutely nothing for the farmers of the country. In fact, I am very much afraid that it will act exactly opposite to the intention of the authors of the concurrent resolution, because when any bills come up in the future relative to the farming interests of the country we will simply be told that there is a commission now investigating all such farming questions and that the matter must wait. However, as the Senator from Wisconsin is very anxious about the matter, I am going to withdraw, if I may have unanimous consent for that purpose, my motion to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin was agreed to. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion is withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE-ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1084) to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4803) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes.

Tuesday, May 31, 1921.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have heretofore directed the attention of the Senate to what the 1916 program is, and the enormous cost which it involves. That program calls for—

Ten first-class battleships.
Six battle cruisers.
Ten scout cruisers.
Fifty torpedo-boat destroyers.
Nine fleet submarines.
Three fuel ships.
One repair ship.
One transport.
One hospital ship.
Fifty-eight coast submarines.
Two destroyer tenders.
One fleet submarine tender.
Two ammunition ships.
Two gunboats.

Though it was estimated at the time this program was devised that its cost would be approximately $544,000,000, there has already been expended toward its completion substantially that amount, and it will involve the expenditure of at least $500,000,000 more before it is finished. But with its completion we will not have a modern or an efficient Navy. Already some of the defects of this program are discovered, and the bill now before us seeks to supplement the program by carrying stupendous amounts for airplanes and airplane carriers.

But the expenditure of more than $1,000,000,000,000 upon the 1916 program will not, in my opinion, complete it. Auxiliary vessels will be required, the cost of which will be hundreds of millions of dollars additional; larger docks, larger and more costly naval bases, additional harbors, increased personnel—these and many other essentials to the enlarged Navy must be procured, at an expense so enormous as to constitute an annual burden oppressive to the people, and in addition there will be increased maintenance charges aggregating tens of millions each year, so that there will be required, aside from the construction work, four or five hundred million dollars annually for the maintenance of the Navy. It is impossible to foretell what burdens this navalistic policy will entail upon the people.

Since the 1916 program was projected the Government of the United States has acquired many vessels and they now constitute a part of our Navy. In the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy, under date of December 1, 1920, it is stated that there were in the Navy "fit for service" on that date 795 vessels. Of these 37 were battleships, 8 armored cruisers, 6 monitors, 24 cruisers, 249 destroyers, 98 submarines, 112 submarine chasers, 19 gunboats, and 55 patrol boats. Let me add that there are now 165 submarines—good, bad, and indifferent.

The Secretary also reported that there were 165 vessels under construction, which, upon completion, would give the Navy 960 vessels, with a total tonnage of 2,910,316 and an aggregate horsepower of 12,865,897. The 1916 program, as stated, provides for 11 additional battleships.

It has been stated by British naval experts that each battle-ship, with the necessary auxiliary vessels, costs $75,000,000. There is some little difference in cost in the construction of naval craft in Great Britain and the United States. Perhaps vessels are constructed there at a cost somewhat less than in the United States, so that to complete a capital ship of the post-Jutland type, with the necessary auxiliary craft, will cost our Government from $80,000,000 to $100,000,000.

These costs were based upon naval vessels of the dimensions now possessed by Great Britain. It is obvious that if larger battleships are constructed the costs would be greater.

It must be remembered that battleships, no matter how powerful they may be, do not constitute a navy. Even the most ardent advocates of the battleship as the unit of strength and power of the navy, admit its impotency in the face of modern naval developments. Battleships, no matter how costly, must hide in protected harbors unless defended by aircraft, submarines, mines, and the new devices which modern naval warfare has employed. The battleship is no longer invincible. Poison gases dropped from the skies may destroy its crew. A floating mine may send it to the bottom of the sea. A torpedo, shot from some tiny boat hidden beneath the waves, may penetrate its vitals and speedily send it and its crew to watery graves.

I have repeatedly, during this debate, challenged the wisdom of building the 1916 program. I have called attention to the fact that when it is completed at a cost not of hundreds of millions but of billions of dollars, taking into account the necessary supplementary vessels, the cost of maintenance and other permanent requirements, it will, if naval construction is to be continued by other nations, not be an efficient Navy. I have shown that the vessels comprised within this program were devised and determined upon in 1915, that the types of the vessels were then devised, although modifications have occurred and doubtless will occur during the process of construction. But it is a 1915–16 program.

It has the infirmities and characteristics of an antique program. It will not provide a modern, an efficient, scientific, well-rounded, and properly balanced Navy. The vessels will bear the 1915 stamp. They will not be 1923, 1924, or 1925 warships. They will be war vessels and fighting craft cast in 1915–16 molds. The tonnage of the most powerful battleship will not exceed 43,200 and the horsepower will not exceed 60,000. The tonnage of the most powerful battle cruiser is 43,500 and the horsepower 180,000.

Several days ago I called the attention of the Senate to the new program of Great Britain. I shall merely allude to it now, but refer to it later. Under this program Great Britain will begin next year the construction of four super-Hoods, each of which will have a displacement of 55,000 tons and 350,000 horsepower and a speed of more than 35 knots an hour. These four super Hoods when completed will be far more powerful than any war vessels built under the 1916 program; indeed, it is the opinion of some experts that they will render useless and impotent our battleships and battle cruisers.

We are pursuing the same blind and foolish policy that we did a number of years ago. In December, 1906, Great Britain brought into commission the first dreadnaught. Lord Fisher perceived that if naval competition was to continue, larger fighting ships would be required. That, however, was before the day of the submarine and the airplane. This great dreadnaught carried only twelve 10-inch guns and it had a displacement of but 17,900 tons. I invite the attention of Senators to this significant fact to show the conservativeness of our Navy Department, a conservativeness that has kept us in the background instead of in advance or alongside the naval powers of the world. But while this vessel was being constructed we were building a large number of battleships which were obsolete when commissioned. The battleships Georgia, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Louisiana, and Virginia were commissioned in 1906; the Arkansas, Minnesota, Wyoming, and Vermont in 1907; the New Hampshire in 1908; and the Michigan and South Carolina in 1910. These vessels were all mixed caliber battleships, and, based upon the standard of the new dreadnaught type, were useless at the time o' their completion.

Our naval policy in respect to the matters just mentioned is an example of the foolish course of pressing naval construction in ignorance of contemporary improvements in naval architecture and standard naval types.

We know that Great Britain, during the past few weeks, owing to our navalistic policy and our announced purpose to drive through the 1916 program and build the greatest navy in the world, has felt constrained to modify her policy, adopted during and following the war, of building no capital ships, and, as stated, is now projecting four of the largest vessels that have ever been produced. Knowing that Great Britain, if we persist in our avowed purpose, will construct super Hoods which will render the battleships and battle cruisers, upon which we are to expend hundreds of millions, ineffective if not obsolete, we nevertheless persist in our folly and propose to build ships which in 1925, when completed, will be ready for the scrap heap.

I might add, in passing, that it was not until 1911 that the United States learned the lesson of the dreadnaught and built the Utah, which was commissioned August 31 of that year. Since then we have put into commission the Florida, Delaware, North Dakota, Wyoming, Arkansas, New York, and Texas, all dreadnaughts; and the New Mexico, Idaho, Nevada, Pennsylvania, and Tennessee, which are superdreadnaughts. The superdreadnaughts have a displacement of 32,000 tons. When they are compared with the super Hoods to be constructed by Great Britain it will be perceived that they are as archaic and as antiquated as were our ships of the Connecticut and Georgia type at the time they were commissioned.

Under the 1915-16 program we are building the California, Maryland, Colorado, Washington, and West Virginia. The average state of completion of these ships is approximately 72 per cent. They are of the superdreadnaught type and have approximately the same displacement, horsepower, and speed, and all except the California mount 16-inch guns; the California mounts but 14-inch guns. With these ships completed we will have 21 capital ships of the dreadnaught and superdreadnaught type of most modern construction and effectivenessmodern if we do not take into account the super-Hoods-which, with the 21 second-class battleships now in commission would give us a Navy of 42 battleships.

Notwithstanding the inferiority of these vessels compared to the super Hood, in view of the vast amount spent upon them, and the advanced state of completion, I believe that the work of construction should go on and their completion speedily accomplished.

The 1916 program also calls for the building-and this is the matter to which my amendment is addressed-of six other battleships, namely, South Dakota, North Carolina, Indiana, Montana, Iowa, and Massachusetts. The South Dakota, North Carolina, and Montana are being constructed in Government navy yards. The state of completion of these ships ranges from 1.2 per cent to 22.3 per cent. These vessels, as stated, have a tonnage of 43,200, and are rated at 60,000 horsepower, and have a speed of 23 knots an hour. The average state of completion of these ships is approximately 16 per cent. They are to mount 16-inch guns. My amendment contemplates that work upon this group shall be suspended.

We are also, under the 1915-16 program, constructing six cruisers, the Saratoga, Lexington, Constellation, Constitution, United States, and Ranger. The average state of completion is approximately 6 per cent. My amendment provides for the completion of the Saratoga and, if adopted, would suspend construction upon the remaining five battle cruisers.

Rear Admiral William F. Fullam, one of the ablest naval men in the United States or in any other country, has given intensive study to the naval questions before us. He testified before the Senate committee in February of this year. I wish all Senators would read his testimony, and I regret that the country is not familiar with the splendid presentation which he made in regard to our naval policy. I will offer a few pages of his testimony and ask that they may be inserted as a part of my remarks.

First, however, Mr. President, I desire to read a few paragraphs from his testimony. He refers in his testimony to our fighting fleet of to-day, and then to the dreadnaughts which are under process of construction and the percentage of construction. This is what he says with respect to these five battleships and with respect to the cruisers:

It would appear wise to suspend further construction of these five ships for at least six months, while it can be determined whether or not they may be obsolete in the near future or if changes in their design may be advisable. They might, for instance, be completed as airplane carriers or they might be given armored decks to protect them from

Mr. President, this is the view of a technician, a scientific man, one who graduated from the Naval Academy, and has given his life to the study of naval problems. He suggests to the Senate and to the country that within six months it may be clear that some of the vessels in the 1915 program may be obsolete. Yet, in the face of his powerful and appealing testimony, it is proposed to drive through the Senate and through the other branch of Congress a program which upon its face and in the light of the facts of which we have knowledge, I submit, was conceived in war times and under conditions which remotely concern the present or the future. Moreover, as I have repeatedly said, and will say again before this debate is over, this program, carried through by the United States at this time, is provocative of naval expansion by other nations. They will build ships which will make the 1916 capital ships obsolete.

Admiral Fullam continues:

Inasmuch as we will have 22 dreadnaughts without these 5, we may wisely wait six months. These ships are not needed, and may not be needed in the future.

Speaking of cruisers, he says:

There are six battle cruisers under construction, as follows-

Naming the six that are embraced in my amendment-

Lexington, Constellation, Saratoga, Ranger, Constitution, and United States. These six ships are less than 10 per cent complete. It would, therefore, be wise to suspend construction on them for six months at least or continue construction only on their hulls and machinery, so that they may, if necessary, be changed in design or be transformed into airplane carriers as circumstances may dictate.

Then he refers to submarines. While this is a digression from the immediate question under consideration, permit me, Mr. President, to read this:

Under construction, submarines: There are 47 submarines under construction. They should be finished without delay. We are fatally short of submarines. There are no submarines in our Navy capable of cruising and fighting with the fleet. It is an amazing and perilous situation. There is not one long-range up-to-date submarine cruiser or mine layer in the Navy.

Senator Gerry at this point in the admiral's testimony asked the following question:

I understand we have one fleet submarine in commission now, and that there are two more very near complete, which would make the three fleet submarines.

Admiral FULLAM. I hope that is so. If devoid of submarines and air forces, a surface fleet, no matter how powerful, will be practically helpless if it meets a fleet properly supplied with these modern weapons.

Let me say by way of parentheses, Mr. President, that our submarine fleet is inefficient. Later on, if I have the opportunity, I shall direct attention to a large number of our submarines to show that one of the companies which is now building submarines is furnishing types of propulsion and of engines that have occasioned great delays and that demonstrate that the type is absolutely inefficient.

I ask that a part of Admiral Fullam's testimony be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

1. Our fighting fleet to-day: The United States battle fleet comprises eight dreadnaughts—Utah, Florida, Delavare, North Dakota, Wyoming, Arkansas, New York, and Texas, and eight superdreadnaughts—New Mexico, Idaho, Mississippi, Tennessee, Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, Nevada, and Virginia. All other battleships in the Navy are practically obsolete. Thus we have 16 modern fighting dreadnaughts. This is a strong force. force.

Next to the dreadnaught fleet in importance we have about 300 mod-

Next to the dreadnaught fleet in importance we have about 300 modern destroyers. This is a very powerful asset.

Under construction, dreadnaughts: There are 11 superdreadnaughts under construction. Of these six are between 25 per cent and 90 per cent completed, as follows: California, Colorado, Maryland, Washington, West Virginia, and South Dakota. It would appear good policy to complete these 6 ships, which would give us a very powerful battle fleet of 22 dreadnaughts.

The remaining five dreadnaughts are less than 25 per cent completed, as follows: Indiana, Montana, North Carolina, Iowa, and Massachusetts. It would appear wise to suspend further construction on these five ships for at least six months while it can be determined whether or not they may be obsolete in the near future or if changes in their design may be advisable. They might, for instance, be completed as airplane carriers or they might be given armored decks to protect them from bombing.

Inasmuch as we will have 22 dreadnaughts without these 5, we may wisely wait six months. These ships are not needed, and may not be needed in the future.

Under construction, cruisers: There are six battle cruisers under construction, as follows: Lexington, Constellation, Saratoga, Ranger, Constitution, and United States. These six ships are less than 10 per cent complete. It would, therefore, be wise to suspend construction on them for six months at least, or continue construction only on their hulls and machinery, so that they may, if necessary, be changed in design or be transformed into airplane carriers as circumstances may dictate.

There are 10 scout cruisers under construction, from 30 per cent to sign or be transformed into airplane carriers as circumstances may dictate.

There are 10 scout cruisers under construction, from 30 per cent to 80 per cent completed, as follows: Omaha, Milwaukee, Cincinnati, Raleigh, Detroit, Richmond, Concord, Trenton, Marblehead, and Memphis. These cruisers should all be completed as soon as possible. Our Navy is sadly in need of cruisers. No matter what may happen as regards capital ships, cruisers of this type will always be needed.

Under construction, submarines: There are 47 submarines under construction. They should be finished without delay. We are fatally short of submarines. There are no submarines in our Navy capable of cruising and fighting with the fleet. It is an amazing and perilous situation. There is not one long-range up-to-date submarine cruiser or mine layer in the Navy.

Senator Gerry. I understand we have one fleet submarine in commission now, and that there are two more very near complete, which would make the three fleet submarines.

Admiral Fullam. I hope that is so. If devoid of submarines and air forces a surface fleet, no matter how powerful, will be practically helpless if it meets a fleet properly supplied with these modern weapons.

A powerful surface fleet: From the above it will be seen that we have now, on or near completion, a powerful surface fleet. Even without the battle cruisers it is strong, because we have a vastly larger destroyer force than any nation except England. This force is so strong that if well manned and well handled it would so threaten a hostile fleet and so well screen our own fleet that, with scout cruisers and airplane carriers we may not need battle cruisers. It is more than probable that the airplane and the torpedo-plane carrier will soon be recognized as a capital ship, quite equal to a battle cruiser in usefulness and fighting power.

Briefly reviewing this subject of our surface fleet, we find that with 22 dreadnaughts, 300 destroyers, and 10 scout cruisers our Navy will stand next to that of England; it will be at least 30 per cent stronger than that of Japan, and omitting Great Britain, it will be more powerful than the combined navies of all Europe.

In the face of these facts it can not be truthfully said that in suspending work on five battleships and six battle cruisers, we are advocating a weak Navy, inadequate for national defense. On the contrary, suspension of work temporarily on these vessels will safeguard us against a policy that will produce a weak Navy as the only return for the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars. A surface Navy alone is a one-idea Navy. Such a Navy is weak to-day, and it will be still weaker in the near future. It is necessary at this point to consider the limitations of a surface fleet: Those who advocate large additions to our surface fleet before providing the submarine and air force in which we are fatally weak are constantly asserting that the battleship is the "backbone" of the fleet; that we need a "powerful Navy," to "control the sea," to protect our commerce, etc., and they insimuate that the advocates of air and submarine forces are not impressed with the importance of a "backbone"; that they are "little Navy men"; that they would not protect our commerce and would give up the control of the sea. But with all due respect it may be said that a "backbone" alone will not suffice; it does not constitute a powerful Navy; it can not control the sea; it can not protect commerce; in fact, a Navy composed of "backbones" alone is a weak Navy; it can go nowhere and it can do nothing. The boot is on the other foot.

Let us consider briefly this much used—ignorantly used—term, "control of the sea."

On page 21 of Admiral Sims's book, referring to the condition existing on the English coast in April, 1917, when the unequaled navy of England, supported by the navies of France, Italy, and Japan, might have been supposed to command the sea, inasmuch as the German fleet was blockaded, we find the following:

"It was not until the spring of 1917 that we really awoke to the actual situation; it was not until I had control of the seas to-day a very different thing from what it was in Nelson's time.

"As long as such a warship can operate under the water almost at will—and this was the case in a considerable area of the ocean in the early part of 1917—it is ridiculous to say that any navy controls the seas. For this submarine vessel, when used as successfully as it was used by the Germans in 1917, deprives the surface navy of that advantage which has proved most decisive in other wars—that is, the surface navy can no longer completely protect communication as it could protect in Nelson's and Farragut's times."

"The surface vessel no longer guarantees a belligerent its food, its munitions, its raw materials of manufacture and commerce, or the free movement of its troops. It is obviously absurd to say that a belligerent which was losing 800,000 or 900,000 tons of shipping a month, as was the case with the Allies in the spring of 1917, was the undisputed mistress of the seas. Had the German submarine campaign continued to succeed at this rate, the United States could not have transported its Army to France, and the food and materials which we were sending to Europe, and which were essential to winning the war, could never have crossed the ocean."

A little study of this subject will give to some people who talk glibly about "control of the sea" a fundamental knowledge of the subject.

Subsequent to the armistice and two years after Admiral Sims went subject.

Subsequent to the armistice and two years after Admiral Sims went to England a new naval force, then in its infancy, has been rapidly developed—the naval air force. And to-day this force operates with other forces to decide who shall and who shall not control the sea. This force, moreover, operates with the submarine to impose still other limitations upon the surface fleets of Nelson and Farragut, The "backbone" needs still more assistance. The surface fleet in the hitherto easy task of "controlling the sea" needs another ally—a force above it as well as a force below it. Without these two forces—if the enemy possesses one or both—the surface fleet can "control" nothing. nothing

A three-plane navy: It must be evident that a modern navy will operate on three planes—the surface, above the surface, and beneath the surface. These forces must exist in due proportion, and must be coordinated strategically and tactically to win a modern naval battle. The navy which lacks force on the upper and lower planes will be seriously menaced. A che-plane navy can not win against a three-plane navy. The Navy of the United States to-day is practically a one-plane Navy. The minds of many naval officers and legislators are fixed upon one, or, at most, two planes. This condition imperlis the Nation.

are fixed upon one, or, at most, two planes. This condition imperils the Nation.

Sanity is demanded in the discussion of our naval policy. Extremists with single-track minds must not control.

In the fighting navy of to-day battleships alone will not suffice, submarines alone will not suffice, air force alone will not suffice—we must have all three in proper proportion.

Recognizing this basic principle as the key to the problem for the present, the first thing to do is to determine whether or not this principle is conserved in the legislation that now shapes our building program. After supplying forces in the three planes it may, of course, develop in the months and years to come that the force on some one plane is of paramount importance. In that event we can modify the building program to suit a new condition.

Submarines in the World War: The following facts should be studied in connection with the subject of "control of the seas":

1. The Germans employed only 10,000 men in their submarine forces.

2. There were never more than 30 submarines adrift at any one time, manned by not more than 1,500 men.

3. This small force was opposed by the navies of all great nations outside central Europe—England, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States—at least 1,000,000 men; and yet this insignificant force of 10,000 Germans nearly won the war by starving England.

4. It is no argument to say that the submarine was finally defeated when we consider the odds against it. Germany was fenced in by England and France. England lay across her front door. There were but two exits for her submarines to reach the Atlantic. About 5,000 antisubmarine craft were employed daily against the 30 submarines at sea. No such condition of disadvantage will embarrass our future enemy, whose submarines may be free to roam the sea. And we may not have the navies of the civilized world allied with our own. Can we alone place 5,000 antisubmarine craft upon the sea and strew depth charges over every ocean? Will we have 1,000,000 men with a navy equal to the combined navies of England, France, Italy, and Japan? If not, the task of downing the submarine of our future enemy will be much more difficult than was that of subduing the German submarine in the World War.

It is positively amazing that many naval officers have already forgotten or ignored these facts, and, having realized hesitatingly the importance of aviation, the Navy Department, and Congress as well, have suggested that we cancel the contract for submarines in order to get money for aviation. This is robbing Peter to pay Paul. Can not two ideas coexist in a raval mind? We must have a strong submarine force and a strong air force, too. Without both of these forces our surface fleet will be hopeless. The submarine single handed nearly won the greatest of all wars. It has proved its prowess, and yet the United States practically ignores it.

The uses of submarines: 1. Coast defense. Small, short-range submarines are invaluable for coast defense. Fifty of these can be built for the price of one superdreadnaught.

2. To defend far-away possessions. The Philippines, Guam, Samon, Hawaiian Islands, etc. A battle fleet can not safely approach a coast well defended by submarines.

3. Attacking the enemy's commerce and protecting our own convoys. It is the most useful of all weapons for this purpose.

4. Service with the fleet. It protects the fleet. It menaces the enemy's fleet.

All these uses are most important. Space forbids a discussion of each.

Advantages of submarines:

each.

Advantages of submarines: 1. Submarines have great sea endurance. A long-range submarine can remain at sea three or four months and cruise 25,000 miles. Imagine such an enemy in the lanes of commerce, Vastly more efficient than the Emden or other surface ships that were soon sighted, then cornered and destroyed. No surface vessel can maintain itself so long at sea.

2. Submarines are self-supporting. The battleship can not go to sea or anchor in port without protection by destroyers, cruisers, and air forces. The submarine needs no such protection. It takes care of itself.

air forces. The submarine needs no such protection. It takes care of itself.

3. The submarine, in addition to fighting with its guns and torpedoes, may act as a most efficient mine layer, carrying 46 mines, with a sea range of 15,000 miles.

Let us now consider the weakness of our submarine force and what must be done to bring this invaluable adjunct to the proper standard of efficiency in modern naval warfare.

This was given to me by an officer, and I do not know of any other who ought to know more about the condition of submarines than he does. If it is wrong, it can be corrected.

Our submarine force: The following is the condition of our submarine force:

Our submarine force: The following is the condition of our submarine force:

1. There are about 30 boats from 300 to 450 tons, all unsuitable for offshore work. They are fit only for training.

2. There are about 50 coastal boats from 350 to 550 tons now in fair condition but not intended for distant service.

3. There are about 50 boats of 800 tons and above, some uncompleted. A few of these may be efficient, but as a class they are failures. I think the contracts have been held up.

It appears, therefore, that in three years following the armistice the Navy Department has failed to develop any long-range boats such as the Germans sent to our coast in 1918. We have spent approximately $130,000,000 on submarines, and the Navy has not one submarine to-day fit for service with the fiect.

In this the Navy Department ignores the past, neglects the present, and fails utterly to anticipate the future.

It is estimated that not less than $100,000,000 are needed to-day to supply this country with an adequate submarine force. This is the price of three dreadnaughts. In view of the fact that we have prospectively 22 dreadnaughts in our surface fleet, shall we add still further to the battleship force before we supply ourselves with submarines? It is a matter of common sense. How will the money be most wisely spent? Shall we put so much money into the craft that did not "control the sea" in the World War that we shall have no money to provide us with the weapon that fought single handed and nearly won against the combined nayles of the world?

So much for the force that operates on the lower plane of a modern three-plane navy. It remains to consider the force that operates on the upper plane.

Naval aircraft: At present the United States naval air force is pitiupper plane.

Naval aircraft: At present the United States naval air ferce is pitifully inadequate to meet modern conditions. What we have is good, and the personnel is efficient and brave, but the force is so small that a hostile fleet supplied with adequate air forces could completely command the air above our surface fleet and subject it to constant bombing from above and constant attack from torpedo planes from above and below. Nothing will justify our leaving our surface fleet to such a fate.

It is estimated that not less than $120,000,000 will be necessary to provide two modern airplane carriers, together with the bombing and torpedo planes, to place our naval air force in condition to operate effectively with the fleet in modern war. This is the approximate price of four dreadnaughts. Without an air force our surface fleet, no matter how powerful, can not exist and operate effectively if the enemy command the air. As in the case of submarines, shall we continue to build dreadnaughts before we have provided the air weapons that are essential for both offensive and defensive naval warfare? It is once more a question of the most economical investment of our money. If we have a powerful surface fleet, with no air or submarine fleets, money spent upon our Navy will be wasted. It will be a weak Navy in every sense of the word.

Senator Hale. Where did you get the figures, $120,000,000?

Admiral Fullam. They were prepared for me by the best authority on aviation in this country.

Senator Hale. The evidence that we have before us is that we can get two carriers for $48,000,000.

Admiral Fullam. I accept that.

Mr. KING. It will be observed that the amendment which I have offered does not go as far as Admiral Fullam recommends. He suggests the suspension of work not only upon the five battleships but upon all the battle cruisers. I am recommending the suspension of work upon the five battleships and upon five battle cruisers. In other words, I would complete five battleships and one battle cruiser and suspend work upon the remainder. It will be observed that Admiral Fullam regards the policy which he suggests as essential to give an adequate Navy and denies that his program calls for a "weak Navy."

Profiting by the experience of the war, Admiral Fullam rec-

Profiting by the experience of the war, Admiral Fullam recognizes that the capital ship has its limitations and that without supplementing it with aircraft, aircraft carriers, submarines, torpedo boats, destroyers, mines, and other modern naval weapons, battleships cease to be the formidable agency which they were in the past. He emphasizes the importance of the submarine and calls attention to the imperfect submarines which our Navy has. It would seem that his criticism of the Navy Department for its failure to have adequate submarines is entirely justified. Having spent $130,000,000 on submarines, the admiral concludes that "the Navy has not one submarine to-day fit for service with the fleet." In view of the importance of the submarine as an arm of our naval defense, it would seem wise to create a submarine bureau or make some radical changes in the methods employed in the Navy Department in dealing with this vitally important matter.

If we are to continue building war vessels, I shall at an early date offer a bill for the establishment of a submarine bureau in order that this branch of the Navy may receive that intelligent and scientific treatment which its importance demands.

The testimony of Admiral Fullam, as well as the deductions to be drawn from the testimony of Admiral Sims, seem to justify the conclusion that the Navy Department and the General Naval Board have been more interested in completing the 1915–16 program than in providing a modern and efficient Navy. It is only recently that the Navy Department has given proper attention to airplanes.

Admiral McVey admitted in his testimony before the committee that the capital ships we now have, when the 1916 program shall have been completed, will be obsolete, and with that knowledge, and with the further information that Great Britain has planned four fighting ships superior in every way to our battleships, those now constructed and those to be constructed, we tenaciously follow a plan presumably because of its antiquity and our blind devotion to the past.

Capt. Craven, a naval officer of ability, stated that a battleship without a supplement of airships, submarines, and torpedoes would be a pitiful thing on the high seas. He stated the character of war has been changed by the advent of the submarine, the mine, and the aircraft. We no longer wish to take capital ships to the coast of the enemy. You could not do it in the future as you have in the past.

He approved Admiral Fullam's plan for a three-plane navy; that is, for an adequate surface navy, for a suitable undersurface navy, and for an aerial navy.

The Scientific American, in its issue of January 1, 1921, speaking editorially, says:

The need for going slow on new construction, especially of capital ships, is the more apparent when we remember that the European nations, including Great Britain, have laid down no capital ships, and practically no warships of any kind for the past two years.

The writer would have been accurate if he had stated that Great Britain has laid down no capital ships for more than five years, and France has broken up three of the capital ships the keels of which were laid some three or four years ago.

The editorial proceeds:

Partly is this due to financial stringency, but unquestionably, at least in the case of Great Britain, it is due also to the recognition of the formidable part which war in the air is destined to play in future naval warfare, particularly as a means of attack with large masses of explosives carried to the battleship in the form of close-up torpedo attack or the delivery of deck-piercing bombs carrying enormous charges.

May I add that the New York World has done most admirable service in trying to arouse the people of our country against the wickedness and waste of the military and naval policy which some Americans have projected and are determined to have executed. It has called attention to the enormous sums which have been expended and the millions and billions which have been poured into the furnace of war. It has proven a powerful factor in a noble cause.

Mr. W. P. Wilson, a former member of Parliament, in the editorial section of the New York World, under date of February 29, 1920, referred to submarines and their effect upon future war. He refers to the great range which they will have for operation and declares that—

The submarine of the future may make the oceans impassable on this assumption. Not only will battleships be unable to operate, as Sir Percy Scott foretold just before the war, and as Lord Fisher now repeats, but no army can in future cross the ocean. Neither munitions nor food will be thus transportable. And each section of God's earth will be isolated save for aircraft.

This writer refers to the fact that the German Navy had more than 200 small submarines and that only a handful operated at one time. Notwithstanding these limitations, the U-boat activities cost the United States and the Allies more than $20,000,000,000. They were built, however, at a small cost compared with the cost of battleships. When the war started Germany had but 36 U-boats. Mr. Wilson states that if she had had 1,000 available, it can not be conceived how the Allies could have avoided grave disasters.

Mr. Wilson discusses the efforts made to minimize the menace of the submarine and the fact that a number were destroyed. Notwithstanding the devices for the annihilation of the U-boat, the writer states that one thing is certain: "Whatever happens to the battleship, the submarine has come to stay." He suggests that if the big battleships like the British Hood are still constructed we must remember that—

Spending departments are conservative and love extravagance.

I think he visualized American methods of administration, and that he had in mind our departments and their inefficient and extravagant methods.

Ten years after the fight between the Monitor and the Merrimac, which inaugurated iron war vessels, navies were constructing obsolete wooden battleships. The submarine is unpopular with the sailors. It is an uncomfortable place in which to spend one's professional life. It obliterates the picturesque, which has counted for so much on the ocean. At the same time, it is for the taxpayers on both sides of the Atlantic to say how far they intend to foot the bill for vast superdreadnaughts which may be and have been useless in the grim game of naval warfare.

It seems that our Navy Department and Naval Board are subject to the criticism made by this distinguished author. Their conservativeness leads to adherence to old types and extravagance and in demands for numerous appropriations, which is a chronic disease which neither time nor party nor administration eradicate.

The Scientific American, in its issue of August 14, 1920, discusses the naval designs, and asks whether "naval design, construction, strategy, and all the rest of it is in a state of flux." Reference is made to the situation when Admiral Beatty led the German fleet into contact with the British, and when Jellicoe, with 25 battleships, had the speed and power to close in and absolutely annihilate the Germans. The editor declares that he failed to do so because of the fear of the torpedo. He suggests that the gas engine "upset many of the theories and practices of naval construction and warfare." Reference is made to the scrapping by the British of "half their battleship fleet, and their stopping of all battleship construction." The editorial then proceeds:

We believe that in future war the torpedo will at last come into its own, and it, will be the internal-combustion engine that will work the change. It gave us the motor car and the airplane, and now it is perhaps destined to dethrone the battleship and battle cruiser as the supreme elements of naval strength. But how? Well, the British have several large and fast torpedo-plane carriers. Let us forecast a duel between a 12-gun, 23-knot Massachusetts and a 32-knot torpedo-plane carrier with twice that number of planes aboard. Steaming outside of 16-inch gun range, the carrier would send in her planes, which, swooping down from great height at 150 miles an hour, would drop their torpedoes within close range and return for more. But the bulge will save the ship? No; for the torpedoes will be set to pass underneath the ship and they will be fired magnetically by the action of the steel mass of the ship itself. And you could not put side and bottom bulges, both, upon a ship—she would be all bulge and but little ship.

Permit me to parenthetically remark that a distinguished Member of the House informed me last evening that he had just returned from witnessing some experiments with bombing planes. Torpedoes or bombs were dropped from planes at an altitude of several thousand feet, the target being an obsolete naval vessel which was at some distance from the shore. As I recall the statement of this Representative, it was that there were 6 distinct hits upon the deck of the ship out of 18 bombs released from the planes. This, I believe, is a far better record than that made by our most expert gunners when firing from our best battleships. The opinion of the gentleman referred to was that battleships would be helpless in the presence of this modern instrument of war, which has proven to be a weapon of destruction both on land and on sea.

I have before me an article written by a distinguished naval writer and officer, whose views are entitled to the highest consideration. It is entitled "The submarine situation." I regret that the length of the article prevents me from reading it, but I sincerely hope that Senators will acquaint themselves with its contents. I submit the request that it be inserted in the Record at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE SUBMARINE SITUATION—CONGRESS NOT INFORMED—NAVAL NARROW MINDEDNESS SAID TO RULE OUR POLICY.

[By Quarterdeck.]

It has been repeatedly proved by incontrovertible evidence from the highest authorities in the British, German, and American Navies that the submarine was depended upon in January, 1917, to win the war for Germany in six months by starving England, and that it came within an ace of doing so, despite the navies of the civilized world. Notwithstanding this fact the United States blindly ignores the submarine in its building policy! The situation is truly astounding.

It is easy to account for the interiority of our submarines, for the failure to correct their faults and for the neglect to design and build the new types that were developed by the Germans, as well as by the English, in the last months of the war and following the armistice. There is no bureau of submarines in the Navy Department. There is no one officer with authority and responsibility to give direction to the development of this vitally important element of the fighting fleet. For this reason the subject has either been ignored or thrust into the background during the discussion of our naval policy.

CONGRESS IN THE DARK.

CONGRESS IN THE DARK.

CONGRESS IN THE DARK.

The naval committees of Congress have not been fully informed as to conditions that now exist, and they have not been impressed with the absolute necessity of providing three new types of submarines without which the United States fleet can not carry war overseas—fleet submarines, cruiser submarines, and mine-laying submarines. Congress does not know that all the submarines built or building in this country, with the exception of three boats that will not be completed for 30 months, are limited to coast defense or to short cruises at sea. To be sure, the Navy list gives a total of 12 fleet submarines under construction. But an analysis shows that this list is completely misleading. Three of the number—the T-bonts—are too small, their reliability is seriously questioned, and they are armed with small—18-inch—torpedoes. It is quite as absurd to call them "fleet submarines" as it would be to designate a 1912 battleship, armed with 12-inch guns, as a superdreadnaught.

The three V-boats on this list, now building at Portsmouth, belong properly to the fleet type. They may be ready in 1924. The remaining six V-boats named in this list were authorized by Congress, but they have been stricken from the present appropriation bill. Thus the 12 fleet submarines are reduced to 3, and these 3 will not join the fleet for three years. Is it not wrong that Congress should be left so completely in the dark?

Submarines of Congress and to been submarines are reduced to 3, and these 3 will not join the fleet for three years. Is it not wrong that Congress should be left so completely in the dark?

SUBMARINE OFFICERS IGNORED.

In the hearings before the naval committees of the House and Senate during the consideration of the current appropriation bill by Congress, previous to March 4, it is astonishing to note that not a single naval officer who had had actual experience in submarine warfare was called to testify. The so-called "director" of submarines, who is thoroughly informed on the subject, though he has no real authority to direct submarine policy, was not permitted or invited to appear and present the facts concerning our submarine deficiencies and crying needs. And there were other officers of high rank and experience with our submarine forces who have studied the subject with intelligent and zealous interest. Had they been called before the committees they would have presented facts and recommended measures concerning our submarine forces which are vital to the efficiency of a fighting navy in modern war. fighting navy in modern war.
Why was Congress deprived of their advice?

GERMAN BOATS SUPERIOR.

The marked superiority of the German U-boats, as compared with our own, is well known to the officers who from experience and observation are competent to judge. In fact, this condition has been brought to the attention of the Navy Department from time to time by official reports of inspection and by officers who from a sense of duty to the Navy have feit the need of adopting new and improved machinery and of building new types. It would not be strange that four years of submarine warfare should result in the perfection or material improvement of many constructional and practical features in the craft upon which Germany mainly depended to win the war. This fact has been clearly demonstrated by the record and inspection of two captured German boats which were brought from Kiel to the United States. One of these boats has cruised 17,000 miles without a mishap to its machinery. In this respect, as well as to many others, the inferiority of our submarines is conclusively proved. And as regards types, it is well known that the Germans sent cruiser submarines and mine layers to our coast in 1918.

NEED OF CRUISER TYPES.

NEED OF CRUISER TYPES.

These boats remained at sea for months, sank many ships by torpedoes and gunfire, and one mine layer alone sank an armored cruiser and seriously damaged a battleship. Notwithstanding this fact, proving, as it did, three years ago the necessity for such types in offensive warfare overseas, not one boat of this type has been produced in our Navy and only three may join the fleet in 1924—six years after the Germans demonstrated their offensive usefulness in war!

By a decree of the council of ambassadors these German U-boats now in our possession are to be destroyed by bombing experiments prior to August 31, 1921. Have we taken proper measures to secure plans of their machinery and superior fittings for adoption in our inferior boats before these efficient fighting craft are destroyed? It is inconceiveable that the Navy Department will neglect such an opportunity. We shall see.

that the Navy Department will neglect such an opportunity.

There is no room for narrow-mindedness in considering the forces, the types of ships, and the weapons that must be provided if the United States is to have a strong Navy in 1921 and in years to come. The naval mind must not be controlled by a single idea. If legislation satisfies itself with a one-idea navy, there can be but one result—the expenditure of enormous sums of money with no adequate return for the investment. The battleship alone is not all-sufficient. The submarine alone is not all-sufficient. Air forces alone are not all-sufficient.
They are interdependent. All three are necessary to a modern navy.
Notwithstanding this self-evident fact, the House Naval Committee framed a bill with no provision for submarines and with a pittance for air forces! The Senate Naval Committee has made provision for a small air force, but it has confirmed the action of the House in striking out six submarines—the one item of most importance to the Navy at this time. We are confronted, therefore, with the legitimate fruit of naval narrowmindedness—a surface fleet with submarine and air forces so totally inadequate that our Navy appears to be hopelessly sentenced to the defensive in war. It is a condition at once alarming and in-

It is interesting to note the recent opinions of Admiral von Scheer:
"We came out again on August 19 (after the Battie of Jutland) for the purpose of attacking Sunderland in the hope of infuriating Great Britain and forcing a new battle. I steamed into the North Sea. For what happened let me quote from the London Times:

"'Again, on August 19, the commander of the grand fleet, with a superior force, for a second time time came in contact with the enemy and sent the following signal: "I expect to be in action in a few minntes and have every confidence in the result." Immediately afterwards he was attacked with torpedoes. Two cruisers were sunk, no battleships came into action, and in half an hour the battle fleet was stering for its base."

Von Scheer continues: "Our fleet remained in possession of the North Sea that day and our submarines taught the world a lesson that will not be forgotten—that a few submarines could make England uncertain regarding the value of her grand fleet. Thus the August battle showed that Great Britain's fear of loss through our submarines kept her from engaging in battle.

"The Battle of Jutland and the August affair changed the whole course of the naval campaign. Great Britain blockaded Germany.
Germany submarined British commerce, while the fleets remained in their harbors."

Germany sub their harbors.

Later on Admiral von Scheer pays further tribute to the power of the submarine in war: "The strongest fleet has no opportunity for victory if it is forced by its adversary to stay in port through fear of sub-

"Nowadays the greatest naval fleet can not guarantee the safety of its merchant fleet unless the enemy's submarine bases are destroyed."

BROADMINDEDNESS REQUIRED.

There are officers of ability in all navies who confirm the opinion of Admiral von Scheer as to the value and the rôle of the submarine; and now we find air forces coming to the front. We need not and should not be stampeded by these new weapons; but we must intelligently recognize their importance. Broadmindedness should rule in naval policy. Narrowmindedness is now in the ascendency in the United States Navy.

Mr. KING. The writer of the article refers to the fact that submarine officers have been ignored in the hearings conducted by the House and Senate committees. I believe his criticism is warranted. I do not recall any submarine officer appearing before the Senate Naval Committee, and my information is that the same is true of the House committee. There are a number of naval officers who are familiar with submarine construction, their defects, and their elements of strength. These officers have had large and practical experience in submarine warfare. Their testimony would be enlightening to the committee and important to Congress and their recommendations would possess merit. In view of the large number of inferior submarines in our Navy and the manifold defects in their construction and operation. I submit that the views of these officers should be obtained and their recommendations should receive full and fair consideration. There is too much of a disposition in both the Army and in the Navy to concentrate in the hands of a few officers all authority, and to constitute them the sole medium through which information is permitted to reach Congress. I believe that a full investigation of our aircraft policy and our present and future program should be made by a joint committee of the House and the Senate, and the practical experience of flying men and constructors should be brought to the attention of the House and Senate Naval and Military Affairs Committees, and I believe that a like course should be pursued with respect to submarines. We need more light and should have the views of practical, experienced constructors of submarines and the testimony of officers and men who have had experience in submarine warfare.

It would seem, in the light of all the facts, that even the most fervid advocate of navalism would support a policy which calls for the greater use of submarines and aircraft, as well as such other instrumentalities as the war and recent scientific developments have demonstrated to be vital in naval contests. lacking in submarines if we are to maintain a modern and efficient Navy. We are defective in our preparations for aerial warfare. We have no submarines for the laying of mines, nor have we given sufficient attention to the construction of mines and torpedoes, or brought into practical application the use of gases in naval warfare.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] a day or two ago in debate stated that in his opinion naval warfare would be revolutionized within a few years, and that the capital ships would not perform the important functions that in the past they had discharged. The development of high-power explosives and the destructive and poisonous gases will modify naval warfare as they have changed land warfare. If capital ships are to be employed in the future, there must be protection against explosives dropped from the air. There must be greater protection, if possible, from the deadly results of torpedoes.

The bill before us does not seem to take into account the large place which torpedoes, to be fired magnetically, and radiocontrolled instrumentalities are to play in the future of naval I regret that it becomes necessary for the construction of any battleships, but I appreciate the fact that under present conditions we are compelled to maintain a strong and efficient Navy. I have repeatedly declared, during the debate upon this bill as well as upon the naval bill in the closing hours of the last session of Congress, that I was not advocating the "scrapping" of the Navy, nor was I supporting a policy for a "little Navy." Some dishonest newspapers and some belligerent and warlike persons in our midst insist that any opposition to the 1916 program, or any criticism of our naval policy, implies a deadly hostility to any navy, and furnishes convincing proof of the disposition of the critic to absolutely destroy our Navy.

Mr. President, is there anything so sacred about this 1916 program that it becomes an offense to criticize it? Is it so sacrosanct that no one may lay his impious hands upon it? It shows that it was drafted by finite minds-very finite-and it is now proposed to make it an immutable and unchangeable formula with the sanctions of law. I say, with all due respect to Senators and those who are implacable in their opposition to any proposed change or modification of this plan, that a Great War has been fought since this program was devised and a new era of warfare has been ushered in. The things of yesterday do not meet the requirements of the present and the future. However perfect this program was six years ago, it is now so inadequate and hopelessly defective as to demand material modifications. I therefore feel no impropriety in criticizing this obsolete, reactionary program, particularly when there is exhibited such blind tenacity in adhering to its provisions. Moreover, this policy which calls for the construction of 156 war vessels menaces the successful efforts of those humane and patriotic Americans who are seeking to end naval and military competition and prevent international bankruptcy. Now, as in the past, fierce denunciation follows those who oppose a militaristic and navalistic policy. They are denounced as pacifists, and imputation is often made that they are devoid of that spirit of Americanism essential to preserve our Government and its ideals. It is insisted that a proper national policy demands large armies and the most powerful Navy in the world, and that efforts to relieve the people from the burdens of taxation and secure international disarmament and world fellowship betoken a maudlin sentimentality and foolish and utopian ideals detrimental to wholesome public thought and sound national policies.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to say here that during the last few days I have noted in some of the papers that the report of the votes on these amendments have had headlines reading, "Fight on Navy fails," as if the effort to amend this bill in particulars which we think advisable should be construed as a fight on the Navy itself. I regard reports of that kind as exceedingly unfair and unjust.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the observations of the Senator from Texas are warranted. It is true the naval bill in the closing hours of the last session was defeated, and it is likewise true that in the debate upon the pending measure opposition has been voiced to some of the provisions of the bill. The House, after full investigation, passed a naval bill carrying $400,000,000 appropriation for the next fiscal year. The Senate committee has added $100,000,000 to the House bill. A number of Senators are opposed to some of the provisions of the House bill and a greater number are insisting that some of the provisions reported by the Senate Naval Affairs Committee should be eliminated from the bill.

No one is fighting the Navy. No one is opposing a modern and efficient Navy. There are some Senators who are attempting to point out the archaic and defective naval program which finds approval in the bill before us. A number of Senators are insisting that the United States should immediately cooperate with other nations with a view to ending this naval rivalry which is bankrupting the world, and that pending a conference of the leading nations of the world, in the interest of world peace and the limitation of armaments, our Nation should suspend work upon some battleships and cruisers.

All Senators are in perfect accord that if there shall be no international agreement to modify or end naval competition, then the United States should have a well-rounded and thoroughly modern and adequate Navy. Unfortunately, the attitude of these Senators is misrepresented by some portions of the press. I believe that most of the newspapers of the United States are considering our naval policy in a rational and patriotic way. There are some newspapers so hysterical, reactionary, and intemperate that it is impossible for them to fairly present the facts and state the issues. They seem intent upon inflaming public opinion, creating resentments and international suspicions and complications. They seem to be more interested in developing a militaristic spirit than in speaking the truth and discussing in a calm and statesmanlike way national and international problems which vitally affect the peace and welfare not only of the people of this Republic but of the world.

Mr. President, I have always been an advocate of a strong, modern, and adequate Navy. The Democratic Party has opposed a large standing Army, but it has always supported a broad and liberal naval policy. But I have felt that the greatest curse of the world is militarism and that only through the interposition of Providence has the world escaped from the triumph of a brutal imperial autocracy. I have felt that the time has come when the enlightened nations of the world must come together for the purpose of formulating a rational plan to secure disarmament or relief from the destructive military and naval competition which threatens a revival of war and the ultimate bankruptcy of the entire world.

When we contemplate the frightful cost of the last war and its evil effects upon the social organism it would seem that everywhere throughout the land the voices of the people would be united in a demand for the termination of war with its horrors and brutalities and its debasing, demoralizing effects. Europe now is suffering from wounds which seem almost fatal. We are facing a known obligation of more than $24,000,000,000 and prospective expenditures that will, in my opinion, within the next 25 years add at least $20,000,000,000 additional, as burdens to be met by the American people. No one can compute what this war cost the world. Statisticians declare that the immediate cost was more than two hundred billions. The burdens which will inevitably fall upon later generations will swell this stupendous amount until the human mind will be unable to grasp its immensity. These losses which have been estimated in figures, which may, because of their number be meaningless to the average mind, are only a part of what the world has lost and for which it will be required to pay.

Millions of human beings, the flower of nations, rest in known and unknown graves in nearly every land and clime. Millions of wounded and helpless men are left to face the problems of life with sorrow if not despair in their hearts, and millions must depend upon the charities of friends or the gratitude of nations for maintenance. The physical losses may be computed, and yet that is problematical, but the moral and the spiritual losses we may not appraise.

I have felt that we would bring upon this Nation the condemnation of a P'vine Providence if we did not lead the world back into the paths of sanity and set an example that would compel world peace and sound the destruction of a policy of competitive armanent which always has, and always will, provoke war and add to the already unendurable burdens which afflict humanity. We are in a position to lead the way. Our moral strength, our financial resources, and our physical power compel us to assume the responsibility of world leadership. But the debates in the Senate, and the attitude of many in our land lead to the conclusion that we renounce this high privilege, that we close our eyes to the moral requirements of the hour and seek guidance only from the blurred, blotted, and bloody pages which record humanity's tragic evolutions.

I have believed that there was sufficient virtue in the world to secure amelioration from naval and military burdens, that there was sufficient of the spirit of fellowship and justice to unite most, if not all, nations of the world in a union or federation which would call for disarmament or reduction to a minimum of naval and military burdens. I have felt that to secure this world union or world cooperation, this Nation must take the lead, that it must evince a sincere desire to end militarism and navalism, and that its example would be so impressive upon other nations as to bring them into common accord and amity and world peace. But we are manifesting a belligerent and, indeed, a warlike spirit.

It is true that we disclaim any military purposes. We aver our solicitude for the welfare of the world, and yet we propose legislation which will result in commercial isolation and proclaim national selfishness and engender militaristic propensities.

In the discussions in the Senate, and in the columns of the press, there is exhibited too often an intolerance toward other nations; and we sometimes arrogate to ourselves a superiority which is exhibited in contemptuous criticism of other peoples, and in deprecatory allusions to their policies and purposes. Moreover, it is thought by some that we are developing a cynicism and a materialistic attitude, which are obstacles to that worthy and genuine idealism essential to leadership or service.

It must be apparent that the statements made in Congress and in the press that we must have the largest navy in the world and that war is possible, if not imminent, between our Nation and Great Britain or Japan, or both, must react unfavorably throughout the world.

Notwithstanding the contributions of this Nation to the cause of freedom throughout the world, there are peoples who entertain doubt as to our sincerity, and fear that the United States is not as disinterested and altruistic as many Americans proclaim her to be. In recent debates in Japan and England, and in other nations, the question has been asked, Why is America Why is she carrying out her 1915 program? nations to the south of us have not always felt that we were free from imperialistic designs. When we propose the largest navy in the world and to continue, at a time when the world is staggering under burdens and is unable to secure food and fuel and the necessities of life, the expenditure of a billion dollars a year for the maintenance of an army and navy, the example is not reassuring to the world, and it is not conducive to their peace of mind or to allay suspicions which may be entertained as to the peaceable and disinterested purpose of our Government.

I believe that we should encourage the nations of the world to disarm, to cease building navies, and to devote their energies to peace and to the economic and industrial development of their countries. Now more than ever, not only for the good of the world but for our own welfare and advancement, must the United States play the rôle of peacemaker throughout the world. It need not form alliances which are entangling or project itself into the domestic or internal affairs of peoples, but it can employ its great influence and its unexampled power to bring order and peace and justice out of the chaos and confusion and animosities now filling the world.

Unquestionably labor in all parts of the world is more united in demanding world peace now than ever before. No longer may men be led to the shambles or to die upon unknown battle fields at the whim and caprice of an autocrat or to satisfy the ambitions and wicked imperialistic designs of a military cabal. Now is the appointed time for a world movement for peace, for the establishment of international tribunals to which resort may be had to settle international controversies.

The benignant spirit of municipal law and its happy consequences can be imported into international relations and there can be developed an international spirit and an international code of laws which will be the precursor of a higher standard of world civilization. I have felt that if the United States took any step or adopted any policy at this critical period of the world, at this hour when the nerves of all peoples are unstrung and an international tension exists—which needs but the slightest shock to precipitate further conflicts—that would further impair the faith of the world in the American people and in this Government, it would be a calamity the consequences of which no one could foretell.

May it not be truthfully said that America is the hope of the world? If it is felt that this Nation is imperialistic, that it is following a policy to give it the unchallenged control of the seas, it will fill with dismay the hearts of millions and provoke resentments which will be detrimental to world union and to the stabilization and, indeed, the pacification of society. We can not disassociate ourselves and our example from its effects upon world psychology. We may seek isolation and feel that our national naval policy should not and can not affect others, but the position is fallacious. Whatever we do will influence other nations for weal or for woe, for good or for ill. What does the record and example of this Nation prove to the world?

It is frequently said that we desire world disarmament, but that the advances must be made by other nations. A few days ago, during the debate, the Senator from Massachusetts asked whether an invitation had been extended to the United States to participate in a conference to prevent competitive armament or to secure disarmament. First, let me say that this Nation ought not to await invitations from other nations to inaugurate a movement so beneficent and so vital for the good of the world. America should lead, and not follow, in this great enterprise. However, the leading nations of the world have repeatedly evinced their sincere desire to alleviate the conditions resulting from militarism. The treaty of Paris contains a rational and feasible plan to secure disarmament. A commission is now acting under the authority of that treaty. However, its activities are impeded by reason of the attitude of this Republic. It has been stated by members of the league commission charged with the duty of formulating a plan for world disarmament that but little progress could be made until it was known what the attitude of the United States would be. It is obvious that the members of the League of Nations, no matter how sincere their desires may be for disarmament, can not devise a satisfactory plan unless the United States shall make known its purpose.

Great Britain, Japan, and other nations doubtless would be unwilling to disarm if the United States refuses to adopt a like policy. We hold the key to the situation. If we spend hundreds of millions annually for war, for our Army and for our Navy, and make no efforts to end war, we are an obstruction in the pathway which leads to world peace.

Our Nation has been invited to join with the commission which is acting under the Paris treaty, even though it shall not regard itself as bound by the action of the commission. We have not accepted that invitation. Leading nations of the world have signified their desire to bring about a reduction of armaments at an early date, but we have offered no concrete encouragement, although we have talked much of our idealism and proclaimed our love for world peace.

Germany, which menaced the world, has no navy, and is bound by the Versailles treaty. She furnishes no ground for our naval demands. France has shown her desire to end naval competition and has canceled the construction of five armored battleships, the building of which was authorized under the law of January, 1914. Her naval program is limited to the construction of a few light cruisers which are to be "lookouts of the fleet." Some time ago work was suspended upon the Normandie, an armored battleship, and a policy of retrenchment was adopted.

Attention has recently been called in France to our naval policy, which exhibits such a marked contrast to the course which she is pursuing. In the Journal de la Marine-Le Yacht, in issue of April 23, reference is made to the demand of our General Board of the Navy for the 1916 program. The article states "This will show that they will have shortly 21 cruisers of the superdreadnaught type and 6 large battle cruisers.' Our naval policy impels some French writers to demand a modification of the French naval program in order that the navy may be strengthened. In other words, our navalistic policy excites apprehension upon the part of some of the people of France, and leads them to demand that France, impoverished as she is, shall construct additional battleships. Italy, important as her interests are in the Mediterranean Sea, and beset, as she is, with serious dangers from Mohammedan peoples of the Levant as well as northern Africa, has practically suspended the construction of war vessels. Argentina, with all her wealth, has but 2 battleships; Brazil, 1; Chile, 1; Spain, 3; Greece, 2; Germany, 6 (second class); Peru, Portugal, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland have no battleships, and but a limited number of naval craft of minor descriptions; Belgium, Bulgaria, China, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Persia, Rumania, Siam, Uruguay, and Venezuela have no effective ships of war of any description, either built or being built.

We can give no sufficient reason to justify this extensive, burdensome, oppressive naval policy which was conceived during the war. Nevertheless, we are told that the administration is demanding its adoption. The Navy Department is clamoring that it be executed.

The recent war developed no reasons justifying the United States entering upon a militaristic career or adopting an imperialistic policy. Indeed, the entrance of the United States into the Great War was a protest against imperialism and the military madness of the autocratic elements in control of Germany. It was recognized the world over that the struggle was between the forces of democracy and the forces of autocracy. It was a death grapple between the highest expression of Cæsarism and the forces devoted to peace and the extension of democratic ideals. It was believed that the war, if it did not end militarism, at least would advance the interests of world peace and promote the cause of social justice. It was fully understood by those conversant with human nature, and the causes which underlie human development, that no matter the form of the treaty following the war the wounds and scars resulting therefrom would not be healed for many years, and that jealousies and antipathies would still persist as a menace to uninterrupted peace and unimpeded prosperity. But it can not be denied that a new faith had come into the hearts of the people everywhere. They believed that a new day had dawned and, though there would be clouds and storms that would obscure the light and disturb the serenity of the people, it nevertheless would bring greater joys and finer achievements and genuine progress as a result of which peoples and continents would be brought into closer and more harmonious relations, and the specter of war would not forever be present as a reminder of tragedies and horrors of the past and a prophecy of evils for succeeding generations.

Of course, students of history and those deeply learned in the philosophy of life appreciated the fact that no neutralizing agent had been discovered that would render society immune from the poisons and diseases of war. Yet it is not a foolish faith which leads millions to affirm that the future will produce international order and peace, as just laws and wise constitutions have secured domestic peace and national security.

Municipal law has reached that high standard and the social progress of communities and nations has been so marked that we find within great States orderly growth and development, peace and progress, and law supreme accepted and obeyed without compulsion or force actually or potentially and not resting in military or naval instrumentalities. The toilers of the world believed that militarism was destroyed when the Central Empires met their defeat. Though separated by boundaries, natural or artificial, and though differing racially, ethnologically, and otherwise, they spoke a common language of desire and hope and faith and were influenced by a common purpose, and they proclaimed that the day of war and conquest must end and the reign of humanity and justice be ushered in. Upon the same bloodstained battle fields many races had struggled, fighting for the same fundamental causes. Racial lines disappeared, deep-seated antagonisms and animosities were obliterated, and there came into the hearts of the armed and battling ranks, as well as into the hearts of the millions who were left behind and in the homes and factories and fields, whose efforts were being exerted to support on land and sea the soldiers who held the honor of nations and the fate of the world in their grasp, a sublime faith that a new world had been born and that the future would be dedicated to peace and not war, and that, freed from the burdens of militarism, humanity consecrated to freedom and justice would advance with unfettered steps to great moral victories and spiritual achievements.

It can not be denied that the reactions of the war have been disappointing. The springs of selfishness send forth their bitter waters now perhaps not as copiously as in the past but nevertheless in quantity sufficient to keep alive ambitions and purposes which it was hoped had been extinguished forever. It was inevitable that the war would have illusions and that the conditions following the war for many years would constitute a period of disillusionment. Human nature is not transformed overnight. It is the product of ages. We are creatures indurated with heavy lines of the pressing centuries of the past. The passions and racial prejudices and hatreds which have been transmitted to this generation, if we are to believe some physiologists, affected the cellular structure of the brain. It has been stated that "the constantly recurring feelings wear channels in the brain. The angry feeling, if it persists, will contact sooner or later in the angry deed. The lustful images, accompanied by ever-recurring pleasure, will at las' issue, almost automatically, in the lustful deed. No one can permanently feel one way and act another. No one can think habitually about the evil and act the good."

It may be added, parenthetically, that the persistent propaganda for a big navy, for military strength and authority, carry lessons to the people of our land which will constitute impediments to the establishment of true international relations, founded upon the concepts of justice and seeking international peace and world-wide fellowship.

The objectives of the war were not the perpetuation of militarism or the expenditure of billions annually for naval armaments. The war was the result of centuries of militaristic training and the product of ambitions and imperialistic purposes incompatible with freedom and justice. Those who had lived in the murky atmosphere of war, who breathed the poison of racial antagonisms and nationalistic hates, could not immediately accommodate themselves to the light of a day dedicated to peace and in which the sun of justice and freedom shot its brilliant rays into the eyes of all. But there are those who believed that the war had objectives international in character, that world peace was one of the prime objectives sought, and with burning zeal and with high purpose sought to guide the footsteps of the stumbling, halting peoples out of the darkness and up the steep and tortuous ways to the path that leads humanity forward. It is a period for the development of character and the molding of the thoughts of the people. May we not hope that the scales of disbelief in righteousness and justice, of unbelief in the purposes of a Divine Providence, will fall from the eyes of a distracted world, so that under the inspiration of a new faith and guided by the ideals of a new day the old world may pass

The Great Revelator speaks of a new heaven and a new earth. Surely the old things must die and the unworthy things of life must perish. It was Lessing who said that the Christian religion had been tried for eighteen centuries but the religion of Christ remains to be tried. The significance of this sentence is obvious. There have been creeds and religious formulas and the shells of religious organisms. They have failed to save humanity, to purge the heart, and to bring into the lives of men the joys and ideals and the consecrations imperatively required if life achieves its highest fruition. Would it not be well for the world to try now the religion of Christ? This divine faith is to be preached not alone from the pulpit but it must find expounders in legislative halls, in executive positions of high responsibility, in counting houses, in the factories, in the marts of trade, and in the homes and lives of the people.

The future of this Nation, as well as of other nations, rests upon the character of the people, and character results from many processes and the structure to which many architects and builders make contributions. As has been said by Herbert Spencer, "institutions are dependent upon character, and, however changed in their superficial aspects, can not be changed in their essential natures faster than character changes."

If statesmen, publicists, writers, and teachers talk of war and preparations for war and great armies and mighty navies, and seek to impress the people with the importance and, indeed, the necessity of leading the world in naval preparations, and further declare that our country is in danger at the hands of other nations, and that our revenues must be devoted to military and naval preparations to avert impending disaster, the minds of the people will respond thereto, and character will be influenced or formed along those lines, and the institutions of the country, domestic and national, made to conform to those mental pictures. It were better if it were taught that—

'A nobler people, hearts more wisely brave, and thought that lift men up and make them free—these are prosperity and vital wealth.

I recall reading a statement made by Thomas Paine to the effect that—

An army of principles will penetrate where an army of soldiers can not; it will succeed where diplomatic management would fall; it is neither the Rhine, the Channel, nor the ocean that can arrest its progress; it will march on the horizon of the world, and it will conquer.

That was not the statement of a visionary dreamer or a doctrinaire, but one whose knowledge of the practical things of life was great and whose wisdom and sound judgment made him one of the most sagacious statesmen of his time, as well as one of the most powerful protagonists of the project for a new world republic.

Removed from the antagonisms and deep-seated animosities which have developed in Europe, this Nation is in a situation to direct the thoughts and lives of the peoples of the world and to lead the way from the mad ambitions and the imperialistic policies and the deadly destructions and disorders of the past. The world needs a leader. The people cry aloud for guidance. Philosophers and students shudder at the thoughts of another world war and appreciate what catastrophic proportions it would assume. Cities would be destroyed, peoples annihilated, and the world laid in ashes. It seems a horrible mockery that the advancements of science, the great movements forward which have improved the conditions of the world, should be converted into instrumentalities of death and national ruin and destruction. The discoveries of science, the remarkable developments in chemistry-these and a multitude of other movements should be the divine messengers to ameliorate the conditions of the people and to introduce into their lives more of joy and peace and justice.

The World War, as Viscount Bryce stated, struck mankind with terror and dismay. It revealed that our civilization had been but little softened. He stated that human intelligence has not been increased, and shows no sign of increase in proportion to the growing magnitude and complexities of human forces.

I can scarcely assent to this broad generalization, although the condition of the world during the war, and indeed since, fails to establish that confidence in the hearts of many in the capacity of the people for uninterrupted progress, culminating ultimately in a day where law reigns supreme and national hatreds and passions are submerged in a world current of altruism.

On the 23d of this month, President Harding, at the memorial services at Hoboken, N. J., speaking of those brave Americans who had given their lives in the World War, stated that "Their sacrifices sped on to accuse autocracy before the court of eternal justice." In eloquent words he declared that 100,000 sorrows were touching his heart, and in his ears were ringing the words, like an insistent call, "It must not be again! It must not be again!" He further states, "These heroes " " saw democracy challenged and defended it. They saw civilization threatened and rescued it." The Chief Executive voiced the thoughts of the American people. The meaning of his notable address is manifest to all—there must be no more world wars. There must not be again let loose the mad passions of military nations. The land and sea must not again be incarnadined with the blood of the innocent.

How shall this insistent call to which the President referred be met? How are we meeting it?

The American people, in my opinion, are insisting upon a national policy that will make for world peace and for America's leadership among the nations striving for the abolition of war, and for international cooperation and association which will terminate competitive armament and establish international tribunals to which resort may be had if controversies arise between nations not susceptible of amicable adjustment among the contending nations.

Mr. President, recurring now to the amendment which I have offered, the General Naval Board submitted a report strongly insisting upon adherence to this obsolete and antique program. Jingoists throughout the land lift their strident voices in support of this inexcusable policy and are fanning the flames of suspicion and hatred against nations with whom we are at amity and peace. Groups based on racial lines seek the disruption of the friendly relations between the United States and Great Britain and between our country and Japan, and employ every artifice to stir the anger and resentment of the American people against those nations. Many who are most vehement in their demands that the United States maintain the greatest navy in the world refuse to perceive that there is a marked difference between Great Britain and Japan and the United States, both physically and geographically.

Mr. President, I mentioned Great Britain and Japan particularly, in view of the statements made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Poindexter] in his discussion of this bill a day or two ago. In the course of his very able speech he called attention to the navies of Great Britain and Japan, and, as I interpreted his position, he justified the naval program which we are now developing because of their naval strength. He also referred to the military operations in Europe and to the fact that large armies were still under arms and conflicts between military forces were occurring. Allusion was made to France maintaining a large army and to the military forces of Italy and to the situation existing in Poland.

I have forgotten whether the Senator referred to the armed forces of the bolsheviks. I have had occasion to say, Mr. President, that conditions in Europe are far from satisfactory. Indeed, they occasion profound apprehension to those who are interested in the pacification of Europe and in the peace of the world. Many who felt that with the signing of the armistice world peace would immediately be assured have been rudely disillusioned, and yet to the student and philosopher the chaos there existing should have been expected. The war shattered not only political but economic foundations. The dismemberment of Austria and the exclusion of territory from German control and the establishment of new nations were bound to profoundly shock Europe's political situation and vitally affect her economic and industrial concerns.

Years will be needed to bring into proper relation the forces and discordant elements there found. The treaties which were written and signed contained imperfections, and doubtless the enforcement of their terms will provoke resentments and bitter controversies. Perhaps modifications of these treaties may be necessary in the interest of justice. Fortunately, the treaties created agencies and tribunals for their rectification and to which resort may be had for relief from unjust or unsatisfactory provisions.

Undoubtedly a united front by all of the allied and associated powers in support of the terms of the treaty would have prevented much of the discontent and many of the conflicts which have and still are disturbing Europe.

The refusal of the United States to aid in enforcing the terms of the treaty created a serious breach and afforded the Central Empires and Bulgaria and Turkey reason to believe that the treaties would be greatly modified to their advantage, if not wholly destroyed, and also resulted in a spirit of insubordination and arrogance which has materially contributed to the unrest and distractions which still inflict Europe. The belligerent attitude of the Germans as well as the threatening position of the bolsheviks has compelled France to maintain a large army, and the serious problems before Great Britain and the difficulties encountered by Italy have seemed to justify their refusal to bring about immediate demobilization of their military forces. No American would want the allied nations to throw away the fruits of victory. Some power must administer the trust created by war. France would gladly demobilize her troops and Great Britain would willingly reduce her naval and military expenses. They are anxiously hoping for a change in the affairs of Europe in order that they may be relieved from the great burdens which the war has entailed and which the further maintenance of armies and navies will accentuate.

Returning to the statement of the Senator from Washington, permit me to observe that in my opinion he failed to differentiate the physical situation of Great Britain and Japan from this and other nations and failed to properly interpret the attitude of these nations toward the question of disarmament.

The British Isles are dependent upon other countries for their food supplies and for raw materials. Great Britain has possessions in all parts of the world and her dominions look to Great Britain for protection. If navies are to exist, perhaps Great Britain has greater reason to maintain a navy than has any other nation. She has been menaced by various powers of continental Europe for hundreds of years, and her navy has been her sword of defense and a necessary protection to her worldwide dominions.

Japan was menaced by Russia, and the 400,000,000 inhabitants of China have constituted and still constitute, unless there shall be a new order in this world, a danger to the integrity of Japan. Japan's insular position has required a navy for the protection of the Japanese Empire.

Of course, these statements are postulated upon the old order and the alliances and balances of power which bound and divided nations and peoples. But the time has arrived for a new order and world fellowship.

China is awakening from her centuries of slumber. This awakening, unless there shall be some movement to secure world peace, forebodes trouble, if not disaster, to Japan. Bolshevik propaganda has found it way into China and has poisoned the minds of some of that race; and bolshevism is pressing through Siberia and seeking the destruction of Japan. More than 60,000,000 of people inhabit a very restricted territory, and the birth rate of Japan exceeds 700,000 per annum.

Forbidden migration to the United States or Canada, or Great Britain's possessions in the Pacific, and obstacles having been interposed to colonization in the Central or South American Republics, Japan is compelled to turn her attention to the mainland of Asia. Her agricultural products are limited and she is dependent upon other nations for food supplies as well as for raw materials. Her statesmen and leaders, if they do not wish their nation condemned to decadence, if not destruction, must seek in every fair and honorable way some outlet for the increasing population and protection for her island possessions. And yet both Great Britain and Japan, notwithstanding the geographical and physical conditions to which I briefly referred and which differentiate them from other countries and which require the maintenance of powerful navies in the absence of international arrangements for a limitation of armaments, have exhibited a sincere desire to join with the United States and the other nations of the world to bring about not alone a naval holiday, but world disarmament.

During the debate upon the naval bill in the closing hours of the last session of Congress I called attention to the fact that the belligerent attitude which we were assuming, and the enormous appropriations which were being made for naval purposes, would revive the waning navalistic spirit in both Great Britain and Japan, and would develop a sentiment more or less insistent that the naval programs of those nations should be revised and immediate steps taken to strengthen the navies of each nation. It seemed to me certain that if the United States continued its 1916 program and supplemented that with a broad and comprehensive program for airplanes and plane carriers and submarines, Japan and Great Britain would be compelled by public sentiment to increase their naval expenditures and embark upon a construction policy.

The predictions which I made have been realized in part. Since the adjournment of Congress Great Britain has modified her program. Demands were made that capital ships should be constructed to meet the naval program of our country. A few days ago I invited attention to a discussion which occurred on the 17th of March of this year in regard to Great Britain's naval program. Sir James Craig, the parliamentary secretary of the Admiralty, submitted estimates calling for the construction of four capital ships "embodying the lessons of the late war," and also for the construction of a submarine and mine layer "embodying the latest developments in these craft and layer "embodying the latest developments in these craft and a number of experimental features." Information of which we are in possession reveals the fact that these four capital ships are to be larger than the Hood and each is to have a 55,000-ton displacement. They are also to carry 20-inch guns and have a speed in excess of any war vessels now being constructed. It would seem that they are an answer to the challenge of our 1916 program. Nearly six years have elapsed since Great Britain laid the keel of a capital ship. During that time she has completed but one, the Hood, and signified her purpose to carry out the plan suggested by the treaty of Versailles and join with the world in naval disarmament. Her statesmen and her parliamentary leaders declared their desire to cooperate with the United States and with all nations in accomplishing this world reform.

In the naval estimates submitted some months ago in Parliament, Great Britain, though some complaint was made because no appropriation was carried for new capital-ship construction, resisted all appeals for the construction of such ships and has materially reduced her naval budget, but when we announced in the closing hours of the last session of Congress our determination to drive through this program, and when Senators declared that war was imminent between the United States and Japan, and statements were made in our country that Great Britain was a menace to this Republic, public opinion in Great Britain forced the parliamentary leaders to a reconsideration of their former estimates; and so, within the past few days, as I have indicated, new estimates have been introduced calling for an appropriation of £2,500,000 for the super Hood ships, the construction of which is to commence next year.

In the debate upon the estimates, one of the speakers referred to the fact that Great Britain had to take into consideration that by 1925 the United States would have built a fleet which would make obsolete all battleships of the English fleet with the exception of the Hood. The debate in Parliament, as well as the discussions occurring in the press and throughout Great Britain, incontrovertibly established the fact that our naval program is responsible for the purpose of Great Britain to build super Hoods, which, when constructed, will render our costly Navy obsolete.

During the debate Mr. Asquith, the former premier, referred to the competitive shipbuilding of the past. He referred to the two-power standard, declaring it to be unsound and unscientific, and then stated that he approved of a frank and friendly discussion with other powers for a limitation of armaments. He quoted the words of the first lord of the Admiralty in his official report of March 17, 1920, wherein he said:

If there is to be emulation between, for instance, the United States of America and ourselves, let it be in the direction of reducing the ample margin of naval strength which we each possess over all other

I might say, in passing, that the debate disclosed the fact that Great Britain is retiring most of her warships, so that she will have only 16 capital ships in commission and 14 in reserve, each of which is becoming every day more and more obsolete. Sir Edward Carson, joining in the debate, referred to our naval program and to the fact that the United States will have 18 capital ships of what are called the post-Jutland class by 1925, whereas Great Britain would have but 1, unless the new program calling for 4 super Hoods should be carried out.

Let me add, Mr. President, that the whole debate seemed to pivot upon the action of the United States. We declared for navalism, and forced Great Britain to revise her estimates and prepare for the construction of more warships. While all who referred to the subject declared that it was impossible that any war should occur between Great Britain and the United States, and all indicated a sincere desire for the maintenance of the most cordial relations between the two nations, nevertheless the debate revealed the fact, as I interpret it, that our determination to build a new battle fleet at a cost, directly or indirectly, of at least one and one-half billions of dollars was responsible for Great Britain's revised policy which called for the construction of only four additional capital ships,

I might add in this connection that Rear Admiral Adair, who played a conspicuous part in the naval operations during the Great War, declared that the strength of the navy does not depend only on battleships; "that the German battleships, twothirds only of the strength of ours, caused the whole of our battle fleet, with its enormous flotilla and enormous number of skilled men, to be locked up in the North Sea for four years' a far weaker fleet absolutely "contained," as the expression goes, the stronger. Lord Curzon stated that two nations were formidable naval competitors, and were "rapidly arming to the

That reveals how our example is regarded in other countries. He did not mention the two nations, but unmistakably alluded to them. He referred to the fact that our country had made it clear "that whatever is done"—by way of arriving at some understanding on the subject of shipbuilding—" will not affect the construction of the ships that are now being built. All that she is prepared to do is to talk about the future after those ships are built.'

Senators have said, as I remember the debate, that we would talk about disarmament when the 1916 program was completed. Can we complain if other nations regard such statements as a challenge and as proof of a disinclination to enter into international agreements to secure world peace and end competitive armament?

Mr. President, Lord Curzon has accurately stated the situation of the navalists in the United States. Many of them talk about disarmament or an international agreement to prevent naval competition, but it is only talk so far as the United States is to be affected, and the 1916 program is to be driven through and completed before our country will consent to any reduction of naval armament or restriction of naval competition. It is manifest from the debate that Lord Curzon and others were unable to reconcile our professed desire for world disarmament with the feverish haste with which we are building battleships and completing a naval program that will provide the United States with the most powerful navy in the world. How insincere and hypocritical our professions and conduct must appear to those nations which are earnestly striving to end naval competition and secure a reduction of ail forms of armament; and no doubt these professions are less defensible when followed by statements so frequently made by public officials and responsible political leaders in our country to the effect that we will only talk about disarmament and will enter into no agreement to secure disarmament or a reduction of military and naval preparations until our Government has completed a naval program the cost of which will be approximately one and one-half billion dollars, and which will result in insuring the United States dominancy upon the seas.

Mr. Prettyman, who occupied a high position in the Admiralty, and who is one of Great Britain's ablest statesmen, declared that everybody will agree that-

Agreement and international arrangement is far better than building one against another.

He added:

If the United States of America and the Government of this country can come to any arrangement by which competition in building can be avoided, it will not be opposed but most heartily welcomed in every part of this House; but if any such arrangement is impossible, it is impossible for us to say simply because we trust and believe in the continued friendship of the United States or any country that we can allow them to have a navy to which our navy would be manifestly interior.

He made it clear in his speech, however, that the practical question before Parliament, in view of the determination of the United States to have a powerful navy, "definitely more powerful than Great Eritain's Navy," was whether from a purely defensive point of view Great Britain should not engage in further naval shipbuilding.

Lord Northcliffe has asked for disarmament, and says:

Why should the nations waste thousands of millions on practically useless battleships, about the future utility of which the best experts are now violently divided?

Mr. Walter H. Long, first lord of the British Admiralty, recently said:

In my speech on the estimates in the House of Commons this year, I expressed the hope that any competition of the future would be in reduction, not in increase, of armaments. My board and the Government showed their sincerity by bringing forward no building program. We even did not finish the ships then and now under construction.

The fact is that the British naval program contemplated the completion of but a few auxiliary craft, the cost of which would be inconsiderable, but, as I have indicated, the navalistic spirit of the United States has constrained the British Admiralty to revise their estimates and recommend an appropriation of £2,500,000 for the laying of the keels of four capital ships during the year of 1922.

We have held the control of the seas to the advantage of the world and to the securing of peace for over 300 years. We are an island power, entirely dependent upon the outside world for our supplies of all kinds; we must have a navy capable of maintaining our ocean highways. We have had different standards. Our strength was at one time superior to the three next strongest powers, then to the two; now all that we are suggesting is that our strength be equal to the next power. Is not this proof of our desire for general reductions of

I have here numerous statements from writers and statesmen of Great Britain showing that it is the desire of the British Empire to avoid further naval rivalry and to aid in bringing about world-wide naval and military disarmament. I repeat, Great Britain has extended to us the hand of hospitality and sought an agreement that would relieve her as well as this Nation from competitive warship building; but we have repulsed her advances, and, as I have repeatedly said, have announced to the world our purpose to have the most powerful navy in the world, Indeed, it is not certain that our Navy now, ineffective and imperfect as it is in some branches, is not more powerful than Great Britain's Navy, and, as everyone knows, it is more than double the tonnage of the Japanese Navy, and measured by all proper standards is more than twice as strong and powerful and efficient as the Japanese Navy. In a statement submitted by Secretary Daniels in January he credited to Great Britain a tonnage greatly in excess of that which she actually possesses, During the war Great Britain lost out of her fighting fleet over 600,000 tons. Among the ships lost were 2 battle cruisers and the superbattle cruiser Queen Mary; 13 battleships, including the 23,000-ton dreadnaught Audacious; 10 armored cruisers; 9 light cruisers; 67 destroyers; 52 submarines; and 6 monitors. The loss of auxiliaries to the navy, including many ships of from twelve to eighteen thousand tons, brought the total loss to the navy of Great Britain to approximately three-fourths of a million Notwithstanding these great losses, England built no capital ships and is building none now, and after the war she struck off from her active list practically the whole of her big fleet of prewar dreadnaught battleships, her armored cruisers, her protected cuisers, and a large number of destroyers, submarines, and other smaller craft, the list totaling 150 ships.

If our Navy Department had pursued the same sensible and rational policy, our naval expenses would have been reduced, and the personnel of the Navy could have been reduced to at least 100,000 men.

These British vessels to which I have referred have been either retired, sold, or broken up. Moreover, the British Admiralty have tentatively condemned all capital ships not armed with guns of 12-inch caliber or more, as a result of which some of her dreadnaughts which are armed with 12-inch guns have been withdrawn from what might be called the active list, and are employed as practice ships or for gun-training purposes. She has abandoned a number of her docks, reduced the personnel of the navy, and introduced economies which might commend themselves to officials of our Navy Department.

Permit me to further reply to the suggestions of the Senator from Washington [Mr. Poindexter] in regard to Japan. I clipped from the paper this morning the following:

SAYS TOKYO WILL FOLLOW LEAD IN DISARMAMENT—LEADER OF DIET PARTY SAYS OTHER NATIONS OF GREATER POWER MUST TAKE INITIATIVE.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 30.

Japan is in favor of disarmament, since the fulfillment of the naval program is imposing heavy tax burdens on the people, but other nations of greater power must take the initiative, R. Nakanishi, leader of the Japanese Diet party, now visiting the United States, told at a luncheon here. The party was greeted by Maj. Gen. Charles H. Muir, commanding the Ninth Army Corps Area; Rear Admiral A. S. Halstead, commanding the twelfth naval district; Mayor Rolph's secretary; and other civic and military notables.

"Japan wants peace in the Orient," Mr. Nakanishi said. "We feel the military burden heavily, but we feel we can not suggest disarmament first, as that would be usurping the prerogative of other nations more entitled to make such declarations."

The party is here to study economic, immigration, and other conditions.

I might say, parenthetically, however, that Count Ishii and other Japanese statesmen, including Baron Hayashi, to whom I shall refer in a moment, have taken the initiative, and more than a year ago announced their desire for naval disarmament.

I appreciate that in discussing the Japanese situation one is liable to be misunderstood and his motives aspersed. It has become fashionable in some parts of the United States to indulge in unrestrained condemnation of the Japanese Government and the Japanese people. There are some in our midst whose prejudices are so intense as to prevent them, in my opinion, from reaching just or safe conclusions. It is regrettable that statements should be made and published calculated to in-flame resentments upon the part of both Americans and Japanese and to disturb the cordial relations which should exist between the two Governments and their people. And it is likewise true that in Japan there is a military and jingo party and elements that seek to incense the Japanese people against the United States.

I feel sure, however, that the overwhelming majority of the American people sincerely desire the welfare of Japan and the prosperity of her people. They recognize the fine qualities and remarkable genius of the Japanese race and are filled with admiration at the wonderful progress which has been made by this people within half a century. The American people will welcome every movement that will tend to promote cordial relations between this Republic and the Japanese nation.

The charge so often made against the American people that they lack idealism and are devoted to the mechanical and material things of life is not just. This Republic was a protest against reactionism, against stagnant or decadent policies and a blighting philosophy which influenced the lives of the people. This Republic was dedicated to liberty, and the American people have sought to maintain political and civil liberty and industrial have sought to maintain political and civil liberty and industrial freedom. They have hoped that their love of liberty and their ideals would lead to world freedom and progress and would be an example to other nations, so that everywhere there would be myriads of hands to hold aloft the torch that lights the way for humanity. And so, while there are reactionary forces in the land, and some whose materialism blinds them to the duties of the hour and the mission of this Nation among the peoples of the world, the American people as a whole entertain sincere friendship for the people of the Orient and for the millions who live under Japan's progressive Government.

Of course, there are racial differences between the Anglo-Saxons and the inhabitants of Japan, and the economic situation in Japan is such as to emphasize those conditions. But the fact that there are differences, ethnological and otherwise, should only strengthen the determination of the patriotic people of the United States, as well as Japan, to maintain amicable relations between them and to prevent misunderstandings or controversies which might be a menace to their peace.

I have no sympathy with the cries of braggarts, whether in this or other lands, or the efforts of intemperate and radical elements who seek to keep alive hatreds and antipathies among nations. Such conduct is most reprehensible and betrays a lack of loyalty and true patriotic devotion to one's country. Loyalty to the United States is best evidenced by efforts to cultivate fraternal relations between it and all other nations.

There is peace psychology as well as war psychology, and as hatreds and venom affect the lives of individuals, they likewise influence the conduct of nations.

The war with Germany is over. We should put behind us so far as possible the animosities of the war and go forth with faith in humanity and charity for all, seeking to bind up the wounds of men and nations and to establish justice and righteousness in all the world.

Let me read a sentence uttered by Mr. Roosevelt in July, 1918: Japan is playing a great part in the civilized world; a good understanding between her and the United States is essential to the international progress, and it is a grave offense against the United States for any man by word or deed to jeopardize this good understanding.

Mr. Henry W. Taft stated, in a reprint of articles published in the New York Times of June 26 to 29, inclusive, 1920-

That there was a friendly attitude upon the part of the Japanese people and their leading statesmen to the United States.

I ought to add that Mr. Taft, Mr. Vanderlip, and other eminent Americans visited Japan and were afforded full opportunity to study the Japanese people and learn of their views and the policy of their Government.

He referred to the fact that-

Despite the complications arising from bolshevism, the disordered conditions in Manchuria and Mongolia, and the strong position occupied by Japan in the Orient, the Liberal Party was gaining ascendancy in political affairs.

He stated that he found-

No substantial basis for an apprehension of war between the two countries, and that the statements periodically occurring in our sensational press upon this subject appeared to me to be utterly without foundation.

He also stated that investigations made led to the conclusion that the military preparations being made by Japan were defensive in character and were no more elaborate than the exposed position of Japan in the Pacific Ocean made reasonably necessary. There is no party in Japan which, from the standpoint either of inclination or of national policy, seriously contemplates war with America. All organized political parties seem to agree that the cultivation of cordial relations with this country is the best public policy for Japan.

On the 3d of February of this year, in the Japanese House of Representatives, reference was made to the action of Great Britain in having suspended her scheme of naval construction after the war, "but she is again discussing a big naval expansion program, being influenced by the American naval extension

As I have repeatedly stated, the naval policy of the United States determines the naval policy of other nations—particularly Great Britain and Japan. What I have quoted corroborates my expressions and indicates that the naval expansion provided under the 1916 program is responsible for Great Britain's modified naval policy. And, of course, it reacts powerfully upon Japan. When we talk of war with Japan and concentrate our fleet of warships in the Pacific and construct naval bases on our west coast, it need not occasion surprise if such a course arouses fear or resentment, or both, in Japan. And yet I know our sincere desire is for peace and the maintenance of the most cordial relations with our transpacific neigh-

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Can the Senator give us any authoritative information as to the attitude of Japan concerning laws passed by the Legislature of California in respect to the owner-ship of real property? Will not the Senator give us information on that point in the course of his discussion of the pending bill, and also what I may term authoritative information in regard to Japan's attitude touching our legislation in respect to the Hawaiian Islands and the Japanese population there? If the Senator would do so, I should feel under great obligations to him.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall attempt to answer the questions of the able Senator from California, although frankness compels me to say that my sources of information may not be regarded by him as authentic and my reply may prove insufficient.

My information, in the main, is derived from the public press, from statements made to me by representative Americans who have recently visited in Japan, from articles and books written by Americans and others concerning Japan and her people, as well as statements submitted by leading Japanese statesmen and publicists. I have also had access to the writings of Japanese and the translations of numerous articles from leading Japanese newspapers, both those supporting the Government as well as those of the opposition party. I have availed myself of such opportunities as the State Department afforded to learn the Japanese situation, and have endeavored in every possible way to keep in touch with conditions in Japan, and particularly as they might affect the United States and other countries.

I think I can state with confidence that the attitude of Japan toward the United States with respect to anti-Japanese legislation in the United States is but little different from Japan's position in 1914, when legislation was proposed in one or more States aimed at Japanese residing in the United States. That legislation provoked some criticism and more or less of resentent in Japan, and representations were made to the State Department by the Japanese Government, but, as I am advised, they were couched in most respectful language and were free from offensive or improper suggestions.

The legislation recently enacted in California aimed at the Japanese has not resulted in any protests from the Japanese Government and, so far as I can learn, has not been the occasion of any diplomatic negotiations. I have seen statements which indicate that portions of the Japanese press and some Japanese statesmen feel that the legislation was unfair and unduly discriminatory against the Japanese. Expressions of regret have been voiced by the Japanese, but the criticisms, so far as I have been able to learn, have been temperate and entirely within legitimate and proper limits.

The Hawaiian Legislature recently enacted a law which I am advised related rather directly to the Japanese, but it provoked no criticism in Japan, and it has not aroused opposition upon the part of the Japanese residing in Hawaii. This legislation related to the curriculum for the schools, and, while I am not very familiar with the scope of the act, my impression is that it sought to suppress the use of the Japanese language, or at least to exclude it from the schools.

Another measure passed by the Hawaiian Legislature required that there should be filed with the attorney general translations of the contents of all foreign-language newspapers, together with affidavits as to the accuracy and correctness of such translations. This legislation was confessedly, I am told, aimed at Japanese newspapers. But this law has occasioned no protests from the Japanese in Hawaii, nor has the Japanese Government made any representations in relation thereto.

I think, Mr. President, that I am well within the bounds of truth when I say that the relations between this Government and the Japanese Government are friendly, and that there is no justification for these constant assertions that war with them is imminent or even probable. I think it may be said, however, that many of the Japanese people feel that this Government has not treated Japan as fairly and justly as it has other nations. I have no doubt but that there is a feeling in Japan that we have discriminated against the Japanese. I believe that Japanese statesmen, as well as the Japanese people generally, have suffered a keen disappointment at the attitude assumed, particularly by the United States, as well as some other nations, toward the question of racial equality. There is no doubt but what the Japanese hoped and doubtless many believed that their services in the war and their participation with the allied nations would give them a higher standing among the powers of the earth and would contribute to the removal of the racial impediments which tend to separate the Orient from the Occident.

The Japanese Government answered its treaty obligations in a highly commendable way, and exhibited a regard for the sanctity of treaties which would have done justice to the proudest and most punctilious of nations. It is quite possible that the Japanese people feel aggrieved, if not somewhat humiliated, because of the attitude of the United States and other nations toward them.

But many eminent men in Japan, as well as a portion of the press, recognize that there are such wide differences between America and Japan, and the peoples of these two nations, growing largely if not entirely out of economic and industrial conditions, that it is the part of wisdom to perceive the true situation and recognize such differences, and with forbearance, genuine toleration, and friendship, remove every possible source of irritation and unitedly act in the interest of uninterrupted peace.

While recognizing that there are racial differences between America and Japan, our Government and the American people should treat with the utmost respect and the highest consideration all other nations and peoples, regardless of racial or economic conditions. We can not pursue a selfish and cynical policy in dealing with other nations, nor can we assume that arrogant and supercilious attitude which will inevitably provoke resentments and bitter international controversies.

The Orient is not only an old world, but it is a new world, and in its mighty recesses are potentialities for good or for evil which can not escape the cognizance of the people of other lands.

It has been said by one writer that the nineteenth century contained much discussion concerning the breaking up of China, and "the European nations were like huge birds of prey around a moribund carcass, ever ready to dismember China and apportion it among triumphant European nations. The shock resulting from the Japanese war aroused China to the dangers before her. The Manchu Court, reactionary and oppressive, wavered, but in the end reforms came, and the republican revolution prevailed. Japan feels vital interest in China, not only because of her legitimate desires for expansion, but as the result of such apprehension as a near neighbor with 400,000,000 of people would create."

Japan has signified her sympathy with European and Anglo-Saxon ideals and has earnestly sought for a comity, American and European in extent. As stated by the writer just quoted, China has excited the cupidity of European nations and has been the field of European exploitations. Can it be said that European and Christian nations have manifested toward the Orient and her teeming millions that spirit of charity and justice and fair dealing which should be the basis of all in-ternational relations? The nations upon this hemisphere, as well as European nations, must treat with the highest consideration, and in harmony with the finest precepts and standards of justice, the nations and people of Asia. Japan and China must be made to realize that this Nation and the European nations are interested in their welfare and progress, and that no invasion of their territory or abridgment of their liberties will be tolerated by the nations upon this continent or in European lands. People of Asia must be made to realize that the white races do not covet their territory or seek to exploit their peoples. There must be no pressure from the outside to consolidate the Asiatic peoples. They should be free from external forces and be permitted to pursue their own lines of development unafraid and free from any menacing forces, military or economic.

Our policy toward Japan and the Orient must be such as to inspire the confidence of the people in those lands and to furnish convincing proof that we are their true friends and are solicitous for their moral and political and economic advancement. I repeat, there must be no pressure from Europe or America upon Japan and China. While there can properly be an Asiatic comity, there must not be an Asiatic bloc formed in self-defense because of real or fancied aggressions by this Nation or European powers. It would be an evil, indeed a tragedy the consequences of which no one can foretell, if the people of the Orient should be driven together for mutual protection and for either defensive or offensive operations.

How important it is that there shall be formed a league or union of all the nations of the world. Such a union would not, of course, extinguish racial or ethnological differences any more than it could obliterate physical boundaries, but it could powerfully affect the mental processes and intellectual perceptions of the people. Indeed, it would make more homogeneous all of the peoples of the earth and remove many of the causes provocative of war and disturbing to the prosperity and peace of the world.

There must be no European bloc or American league or Asiatic league of nations. Seas may divide and rivers and mountains may separate nations, but there must be developed an international conscience, an international code, an international spirit of fellowship and affection which, binding together the peoples of the world, will make possible that brighter day when justice and righteousness will rule in the hearts of men and determine the conduct of nations.

The questions of the Senator from California have led to this diversion, and I now return to the matter which I was then discussing. I was quoting from a translation of a recent speech delivered by a leading Japanese statesman in the Japanese Diet.

The speaker further said:

We can but regard this state of things with great dismay in view of the disastrous consequences of the European war from which the world is now suffering.

Mr. Hamajuchi, a Japanese statesman of high standing, discussed the Japanese naval policy and indicated that it was dependent upon the naval policy of the United States. He referred to the Borah resolution, calling for a conference of certain powers to secure disarmament, and said that the telegrams "are conflicting as to the reception accorded the proposal to reduce armaments." The debates in the British Parliament and in the Japanese Diet prove the deep interest which English and Japanese statesmen have in the naval policy of the United States and demonstrate that any plan to prevent competitive armament would be welcomed by those nations. The discussions in both of these legislative bodies reveal how welcome would be the word that America wished to cooperate with the naval powers of the earth to end the rivalry which is now occasioning distrust and imposing unbearable financial burdens.

Mr. Hamajuchi seems unable to learn what disposition will be made of the Borah resolution. Perhaps he is in the same situation as many Senators. I think some of us are unable to determine what reception will finally be accorded it or what its final end will be. We have been advised from time to time that it was not in harmony with the policy of the President; that any declaration by Congress upon the question of disarmament was regarded as an invasion of Executive prerogatives. Earlier in the debate some of us criticized this attitude and insisted that either branch of Congress had the right to express its views, by resolution or otherwise, upon this vitally important question. Following these criticisms of the alleged attitude of the administration, assurances were given by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that there would be no opposition from the Executive to the Borah resolution. I venture the prediction that it will not reach the President in its present form. The influences which will modify the resolution as it was offered by the Senator from Idaho will not be so hidden and obscure as to prevent their discernment by those seeking to learn the truth.

But I return to this Japanese statesman from whom I was quoting:

Some reports speak of it as if it was approved by the Senate, while other reports suggest its defeat.

The discussion revealed the intense interest which Japan felt in our naval policy, because of its influence upon their present and future naval policy. Reference was made to the statement of Baron Hayashi, the ambassador to Great Britain, who stated that the attitude of the Japanese Government would be determined after the true intentions of the British and American Governments had been ascertained. I might say in passing that Baron Hayashi had stated that in the event of an agreement the powers concerned, including Japan, could reduce their present armaments by 50 per cent. The same speaker, Mr. Hamajuchi, further stated:

I am not blind to the necessity of some naval expansion in case America, for instance, pushes forward with her gigantic naval expansion scheme. This is simply a hypothesis for argument's sake, and I do not for a moment suggest an outbreak of war between Japan and America, which have been on very friendly terms for the past 50 years. In my opinion, there is no need for America to expand her Navy, and, as a matter of fact, that country is pushing forward her naval expansion scheme with all earnestness. With America in this mood, Japan will be called upon to attend to an expansion of her naval strength, but Japan's financial resources do not allow her permanently to compete with that country in naval construction.

Senators will observe that Japan's naval plans rest upon our course. The "pushing forward" of our gigantic naval "expansion" scheme constrains Japanese statesmen to support a plan for naval expansion. It must be remembered, however, that Japan has built but few vessels for many years, and the plan under which she is now operating was devised more than 10 years ago.

Flushed with victory over Russia and fearing attacks from Germany, or perhaps other European nations which were seeking spheres of influence in China, and apprehending a recrudescence of Russian strength and power, Japan announced a naval policy known as the "eight-eight"—eight battleships and eight cruisers. Ten years ago she began on that program, and has proceeded slowly, so that at the present time but a small part of that program has been completed.

Mr. Ozaki, one of the liberal statesmen of Japan, is carrying on an active campaign throughout Japan in favor, not of a reduction in naval armament but of complete disarmament. He declares that naval armaments should be reduced by agreement with the United States and Great Britain and military armaments regulated and retrenched under the covenant of the League of Nations. But he further argues that even though no understanding can be reached with the United States and Great Britain, yet the position of Japan is such that there is nothing to prevent her from retrenching at her discretion and without conferring with any other power.

The Chuo, a recognized Government organ, states that the United States is perhaps in the best position to make the pro-

but she is bent on providing herself with the strongest armaments in the world. While she was a third or fourth naval power in the world before the war, she now aims at outmatching Great Britain herself and monopolizing sea power on earth. So she will never agree to the proposal of retrenching the Navy on the standard obtaining before the war, though financial difficulties may oblige her to modify her scheme to some extent.

The sentiment in Japan seems very strong in favor of reducing the military strength and limiting naval armament. Again, I repeat, our example in demanding the most powerful Navy in the world reacts unfavorably upon Japanese statesmen and undoubtedly causes apprehension in the minds of many of the Japanese people. Unquestionably a social revolution is taking place in Japan. During the reorganization of Japan under the Samurai, during the past 50 years, unquestionably Nippon's career was deeply tinted with the color of militarism, but the evolution new going on is wringing power from the aristicratic branch of the Government and transferring it to the bourgeoisie. A demand for suffrage, for the improvement of women, for radical social reforms, together with the implanting of democratic ideals, are working remarkable changes in Japanese life and in Japanese thought. Knowledge is being acquired by the masses, and with its acquisition the military caste is losing favor, and the desire for peace and world relationship is strengthened. Carl Marx insisted that militarism and capitalism were one and inseparable. This is disproven in Japan; as there has been an increase in the number of those acquiring property, the spirit of militarism has declined. This was Spencer's philosophy, and he insisted that militarism and capitalism were opposite forces and adversely related.

The Senator from Washington, as I recall, referred to the cost of battleships in Japan, and indicated that Japan could construct them at a very much less figure than they could be built for in the United States. It must be remembered that Japan obtains her supplies of pig iron largely from England and the United States. In 1914 China supplied Japan with 60,000 tons; England, 100,000 tons; and the United States, 100,000 tons. We supplied 30,000 tons to Japan during last year. We exported, in 1919, to Japan more than 606,000 gross tons, consisting principally of iron and steel products. The high prices of commodities employed in the construction of her war vessels brings the cost of construction to a figure nearly as great as that obtaining in the United States.

Mr. Y. Ishikawa, one of the important figures in Japan, in a recent article written by him, states:

Japan is no more militaristic than America is. The insularity of her position, not to speak of the unstable and chaotic conditions prevalent in the Far East, sufficiently justifies her armament, while the recent naval and military policies of America should on account of the natural barriers and the arms of defense already in existence before the war, is practically immune from an invasion even by the strongest of the powers, may be a luxury and not so easy of explanation.

He refers to the criticism of Japan because of her territorial acquisitions, and says that they are a mere trifle compared with those of the United States in the American Continent, the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans, and he notes that none of Japan's wars was waged for the purpose of conquest. He refers to the fact that Japan has been made cognizant that the Japanese were not welcome in the United States. Denied admission to the westward and southward, they regard Asia as the only field for their activities.

Viscount Kaneko, in an article appearing in the Yomiuri, under date of August 20, 1920, states that—Japan could not attack America and would be unable to land marines in San Francisco.

He inquires:

How will Japan transport the millions of soldiers needed to make the landing of the marines effective? How will she send provisions? It is altogether an impossibility. Moreover, even if Japan's Army should occupy a portion of the western coast of the American Continent, the body of the United States will not be greatly hurt. Thus, it is plain that a war between Japan and America will not accomplish its final purpose, and because of its utter uselessness will not be waged. War is a great crime. * * * History says that Japanese-American relations are inseparable, yet to-day, to my sorrow, there are some Americans who disregard this history and misunderstand the millions of Japanese and try to destroy the friendly relations between the two countries.

Baron Sakatani, in the same paper, refers to the part played by America in awakening Japan from her slumber and states that the Great War operated to draw together Japan, the United States, and Great Britain and to make them the three pillars in the Orient, in America, and in Europe, respectively, of the world's peace. With the fulfillment of this great mission as their common goal, these three powers are bound to cooperate and help.

I have here articles written by many of the leading statesmen and publicists of Japan, all of which reveal a sincere friendship for this country and an earnest desire for the continuation of friendly relations between the United States and Japan. Senators will recall the eloquent message sent by the Emperor of Japan upon the occasion of the signing of the treaty of Versailles. He spoke for world peace and applauded the beneficent purposes of the League of Nations and regarded it as an instrument for the promotion of concord and the abolition

We are constantly told of Japan's naval expenditures. impression is sought to be conveyed that she is spending sums in excess of those devoted by the United States for the construction of her Navy.

I have before me the report of the department of finance printed by the Japanese Government in 1919. On page 26 is a statement of the expenditures made by the Government for all purposes from 1906 to 1920; although the last two years named are estimates. I made some inquiry, however, and found that the figures stated in the report are within the limits of the estimates submitted. For the fiscal year 1907-8 Japan's expenditures for her navy were only 71,000,000 yen, that would be approximately $35,000,000. This amount was not increased materially for any fiscal year until 1916-17. In that year the amount expended for the navy was 116,000,000 yen. be remembered that this was the aggregate of all costs incurred in construction and in maintenance. In 1917-18 Japan was in the war and her naval expenditures reached 161,000,000 yen; 1918-19, 183,000,000 yen.

Senators will recall that costs, wages, and prices advanced in Japan as they did elsewhere, and notwithstanding the enormous advance in costs her total naval expenditures, including construction and the maintenance of her navy, Pacific and in European waters, were only 161,000,000 yen in Japan expended in 1919-20 240,000,000 yen, and for the year 1920-21 my information is that, notwithstanding the increased cost of materials and labor in Japan, her total expenditures for maintenance and construction will not exceed 250,000,000 yen, or about $125,000,000. Yet we are called upon to expend $500,-000,000, and those who demand this huge sum refer to Japan's naval budget as justification for our expenditures and the expressed purpose to maintain the most powerful navy in the world.

Where do we find justification for these enormous appropria-tions carried in the pending bill? Every military and naval expert concedes the impossibility of the invasion of the United

The able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], in an exhaustive discussion of this question, presented that phase of the matter and demonstrated incontestably the truth of the statement which I have just made. Admiral Sims, as well as other naval experts, have testified to the impossibility of Great Britain, Japan, or any other nation landing troops upon our shores. They can not build navies sufficiently strong to even approach our shores.

Great Britain with her powerful navy, supplemented by the ships which were sent overseas, was unable to effect a landing upon Belgian soil or to reach the ports of the enemy. Why are we building the most powerful Navy in the world? Is it for offensive purposes? If so, who are our enemies? At whom do we propose to strike? What success would we have in landing troops upon the shores of Japan? We might send an armada across the Pacific, but with the shores of Japan infested with mines and submarines and her ability to fill the air with aircraft, our vessels could not reach her harbors and our troops would be unable to land upon her shores.

It has truly been said that "the day of the small nation has come." The submarine, notwithstanding the stubborn insistence of the advocates of the capital ship, has become a shield and protection for the small nation, and a defensive weapon that arms the weak where the strong seek invasion. But I shall recur to this subject a little later in my remarks.

Wednesday, June 1, 1921. NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4803) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. At the hour of adjournment yesterday I was speaking of submarines and their vital importance in any future naval contests. I have listened in vain for reasons justifying affirmative action with respect to the measure now before us. It can truthfully be charged that I have during this debate reiterated, perhaps in such a manner as to cause exasperation, some of the points which I have been attempting to make. I have challenged the wisdom of the 1915 program and have insisted that its unmodified execution is the acme of waste and folly and will tend to perpetuate the system of competitive armament and place the United States in a reactionary attitude and subject her to the criticism of being an obstacle to international disarmament. I have also stated that the 1915 program ignored the lessons of the war and the importance of the threeplane navy, and exhibited a dogged and irrational devotion to the capital ship.

And the proponents of this bill seem utterly indifferent to its enormous cost, to the present indebtedness of our country, and to the additional burdens which their naval policy will impose upon the taxpayers of our country. The United States is now owing approximately $24,000,000,000, and its budget for the coming year, in my opinion, will call for a revenue of more than $5,000,-000,000, and in all likelihood the national expenditures will reach the appalling figure of $7,000,000,000. Comparisons are often made between the national expenses of the United States and those of other nations. The full facts are not always told. Many nations have but one budget, and the national expenses comprise practically the entire governmental burdens placed upon the people, aside, perhaps, from purely municipal taxation. But in this Republic the national expenses comprise but a part of the total expenses resulting from the processes of govern-We have 48 republics within the Federal Government, and each of these sovereign States is required to meet the ordinary expenses of an independent nation, except those relating to the maintenance of the Army and Navy and what might be denominated international obligations. The bonded indebtedness of the 48 States is very great, running into the hundreds of millions of dollars. The municipalities, counties, school districts, irrigation, paving, and road districts have outstanding bonds and obligations totaling hundreds of millions of dollars. And the private indebtedness of the United States, notwithstanding the wealth of our country, is almost beyond computation.

The Federal, State, and private banks have extended credit until the obligations due them reach into the billions. Wherever we turn, the words "debt" and "taxation" are indelibly stamped upon the brows of people as well as upon the economic and business features of the Nation. Factories have closed. mines have shut down, our foreign trade has been reduced to such low levels as to threaten the Nation with an industrial collapse, millions of men are out of employment, and in every part of the land fear and distrust exist as to the industrial stability of the country. And yet, with this tragic picture before us, we continue to appropriate billions and further add to the burdens and difficulties of the people.

Pledged to economy, to retrenchment, to the restoration of business, if not to prewar conditions at least to normal and rational standards, the party in power rushes recklessly forward in a mad riot of extravagance and inefficiency. No promised reforms have been projected or inaugurated. No economies have been substituted. War legislation is continued or reproduced, and every movement looking to world peace, to the reduction of naval armament and the overthrow of militarism, encounters the most stubborn resistance from the leaders of the majority party and, indeed, from the administration itself.

The farmers and many business industries require capital, and yet it is proposed that we divert by taxation from the channels of trade and commerce and business from five to seven billions of dollars for the coming year, the greater portion of which will be devoted to military and naval preparations and to meet obligations which resulted from the world conflict.

Those who are supporting this bill will not contend that our territory is threatened or that any nation or any combination of nations dream of attacking this Republic. Everywhere nations are looking to the United States to lead the way for peace. The people in all parts of the world turn their eyes to America, as the faithful Mohammedan turns his gaze to the holy city of Mecca. This Republic seems to be a beacon light whose rays shine out upon the troubled waters of the world to guide through the troubled seas and into harbors of safety the sorrowing and distracted nations of the earth. What is the justification for this tremendous naval and military budget? How can we justify spending a billion dollars during the coming year for the Army and the Navy?

When Germany was preparing, both upon the land and upon the sea, for the titanic conflict which the Pan-German forces and the Kaiser projected, she never expended in any year a sum so stupendous as that which we are asked to appropriate for the coming fiscal year. My recollection is that Germany's entire appropriation, both for her army and her navy, for the fiscal year preceding the Great War did not exceed $294,000,000, and during that year Germany was preparing for the Great War which was soon to break upon the world. Her troops were being massed, her navy was being brought to the highest stage of perfection, and everything which was deemed necessary to develop the greatest fighting machine the world has ever seen was being done. And yet, as stated, the entire military and naval budget was less than $300,000,000.

Admiral von Tirpitz sought to construct the most powerful navy in the world, and the German Government placed at his disposal whatever sums he required to accomplish his purpose. And yet, in building Germany's mighty navy she never expended to exceed $111,000,000 in any single year.

Great Britain's maximum naval expenditures before the war never exceeded $224,000,000, and yet with the world impoverished, and, indeed, bankrupt, we are commanded to increase our naval appropriations far beyond any figure ever reached before we entered the war.

The largest amount for the Navy ever expended by the United States in any year prior to our entry into the World War was $149,000,000. In 1915-16 our entire naval appropriation was $144,000,000.

I ask Senators to listen to the figures which I shall submit showing our naval expenditures for a number of years. Omitting odd figures and giving only the round numbers, they are as follows:

All appropriations for the Navy, both for construction and	$13,000,000 for maintenance, in 1880 amounted to 1890	22, 000, 000
1900	55, 000, 000
1903	82, 000, 000
1908	97, 000, 000
1910	123, 000, 000
1914	139, 000, 000
1916	155, 000, 000

After entering the war, in 1917, the personnel of the Navy was greatly increased, until at one time there were approximately 550,000 men in the Navy and in the Marine Corps, and, of course, the war greatly increased naval expenses because of the immense field in which our Navy operated and the vast work which it was called upon to perform.

The regular naval appropriation for 1917 was $257,000,000. Of course, there were other amounts appropriated in what might be denominated special naval bills.

But it has been argued that the United States possesses a merchant marine, and therefore must have a Navy greater than any power in the world in order that it may be protected. The theory of some persons seems to be that a battleship must accompany every vessel engaged in commerce. We have nearly 1.700 ships in our merchant marine, and there are thousands of ships, owned by Americans and American corporations, carrying our products to other parts of the world and bringing from other lands commodities in part payment therefor. should be noted, however, that the party in power is committed to a policy which will destroy our foreign commerce, and already American ships which should be carrying our surplus products to other lands are locked in harbors deteriorating in quality and diminishing in value.

Out of the 1,700 ships owned by the Government, built as a part of our merchant marine, less than half of them left their harbors, and of those that have been commissioned for commercial purposes more than 50 per cent have been but intermittently

No nation developed her foreign commerce as rapidly as did Germany during the 25 years preceding the war, and her commerce grew without a navy. German commodities were sold in every port of the world and German warships were not needed for German products to find purchasers in the greatest commercial nations of the world, as well as the remotest and most unimportant islands of the sea.

Americans found no obstacles to foreign trade except such as they themselves created. From 1865 until quite recently America had an insignificant Navy, and yet our foreign commerce from 1865 until our entrance into the World War developed in a most phenomenal way. It is true perhaps not more than 13 per cent of our exports and imports were carried in American ships, but nevertheless American goods and American agricultural products were carried to all parts of the world. We needed no Navy in order to sell our goods. The world wanted our products, and battleships were not required for their transportation or to aid in their sale.

Norway and Holland developed a maritime trade that brought prosperity to their people. They have not been interested for many years in navies. They were seeking markets and build-ing merchant ships. War vessels they did not regard as important in the extension of their commerce. And the South American nations have developed a very important foreign trade. Their products of the value of hundreds of millions of dollars are annually exported to Europe and to other nations, and they purchase from other nations commodities and raw materials of immense value. They are not interested in war vessels and do not accept the fallacious view that fighting ships will give them foreign trade. The money which would be wasted in battleships and in navies is spent in the development of their country and in the promotion of domestic and foreign commerce.

Senators know that Great Britain's naval supremacy gave her no advantage over Germany or other nations in promoting trade with other countries. The merchant ships of Germany and of other lands reached the same ports as did the merchant ships of Great Britain and traded under the same terms of equality, whether in British ports or in the harbors of other nations.

I repeat, Why billions for fighting ships? If we are not intending war or are not expecting an attack from other nations, and if our trade and commerce can be promoted without battleships, why are we appropriating these enormous sums and wasting hundreds of millions which should be employed in channels which will result in increased prosperity for the American

As I have stated, there are those who affect to believe that when we have the most powerful Navy in the world we will be in a superior position to insist upon suspending naval competition and to urge world disarmament. Even if that were true, it does not justify expenditures which, if disarmament comes, must be wholly 'rasted, and which will constrain other nations to engage in competition, fearing that some sinister motive lurks behind our naval policy. But, to my mind, it betrays a lack of knowledge concerning human psychology to advance the position just referred to. If we insist upon being the first naval power before agreeing to a limitation of armament, other nations will be suspicious of our negotiations to secure disarmament, and will seek pretexts to delay the completion of such negotiations, during which time they will attempt to strengthen their naval and military forces. Our refusal to meet invita-tions extended, coupled with a feverish haste to complete a naval program that will give us nearly a thousand fighting ships, will prove disturbing to the nations that want peace, and will furnish ground for suspicion as to the rectitude and sincerity of our conduct.

I return to the subject of my amendment. If it should be adopted and the rest of the 1916 program completed, the United States would still have by far the most powerful Navy in the So that if we are seeking naval supremacy for the United States, it could be achieved though my amendment were adopted. The refusal to adopt this amendment would rather indicate a purpose to construct a Navy which would be overwhelmingly superior to that of any other nation and possibly as powerful as that of Great Britain and Japan combined. This statement, however, does not take into account the recent estimates of Great Britain, which, as I have stated, were caused by the belligerent naval program which we have announced to the world. The completion of the six battleships and one battle cruiser and the balance of the 1916 program, together with the auxiliary ships called for in the present bill, will give to the United States the most powerful Navy the world has ever seen, and yet by modifying the 1916 program it will save the taxpayers of our country approximately $400,000,000. Indeed, it is thought by some competent experts that the amount saved will be in excess of that amount.

It may be somewhat illogical to contend for an international agreement to prevent competitive naval building and yet favor a proposition which involves the completion of additional battleships. I call attention, however, to the fact that the war vessels provided for in the 1916 program, and upon which more than five hundred millions have been expended, and which are approaching completion, could with propriety be finished, and no reasonable objection could be made thereto by those nations with whom we desire to associate in an agreement for ultimate disarmament. But a different situation is presented when demand is made for the completion of the entire 1916 program; and to construct ships the keels of which have been but recently laid, and upon which but a small amount has been expended, can fairly be regarded as a challenge to the naval powers of the world and is tantamount to a repudiation of the proposal that the great powers should unite to secure world disarmament.

Aside from this question there is the practical and financial question to be considered. Already our conduct has provoked Great Britain to adopt plans, as I stated yesterday, for the construction of four super Hoods. As I have indicated, our battleships will be absolutely impotent in contact with these powerful warships. If all the vessels of the 1916 program were completed, they would be powerless against the super Hoods, and we are drawing Great Britain into a policy which will call for their completion by the time the 1916 program is finished. Why increase the number of obsolete ships which we will have in 1925 or 1927, when the super Hoods are completed? If this rivalry is to continue, then it is folly for us to complete the second group of battleships and the battle cruisers, with the exception, perhaps, of one or two. Upon this second group of battleships and battle cruisers we have expended but a few It would be far better to sustain a complete million dollars. loss of the amount thus far expended upon these ships than to complete them, only to discover their uselessness when they are commissioned. We will have enough second-class battleships if we complete the first group to which I have referred. It is supreme folly to construct further ships upon the old lines and of the old type in the light of the knowledge which we now have as to the policy and purpose of Great Britain. If this program of naval competition is to be continued, the wise and prudent course would be to complete the five battleships which are approaching completion and suspend work upon the remaining five battle cruisers and employ the sum thus saved upon new types which meet the superior strength of the super Hoods.

It will be contended that the course which I recommend will entail great loss; that contracts have been let for the battleships and battle cruisers the suspension of work upon which I have urged. First, let me say that I think Congress was derelict in its duty in not modifying the act which provided for the 1916 program. When we entered the war, but little had been done in the execution of this program. It was the duty of Congress to have immediately modified the program. It was the duty of the Navy Department, in my opinion, to have advised Congress of the necessity and wisdom of modifying that program. Senators knew, as did naval officers, that the experiences and lessons of the war could not be fully applied if the 1916 program were hurried to completion. Naval officers must have known that with the development of the submarine and the airplane and the mines and poison gases naval vessels of the pre-Jutland type would be feeble defenses in the face of warships that reflected all the lessons of the war. The Navy Department knew that Great Britain and France and Italy ceased the construction of capital ships after the torpedo and the submarine and the airplane had demonstrated their importance in haval warfare; and yet Congress did nothing to halt or modify that program, and the Navy Department failed to make suitable recommendations in connection therewith.

Admiral Sims has criticized the report of the General Board of the Navy which calls for the completion of the 1916 program. He states that the report is very largely mistaken; that it looks "very much like a report the arguments of which are drawn up to prove what they originally believed." His statement is a caustic criticism of the report of the General Board which recommends the completion of the 1916 program. But because we have been delinquent in the past, and notwithstanding the failure of the Navy Department to recommend a rational plan and a suitable modification of an archaic and inadequate program, we should make amends so far as possible; and that can be done if we cease work upon the battleships and the battle cruisers named in the amendment which I have offered. But it may be said, they can be converted into war vessels of the super Hood type.

It is possible that some of these projected vessels might be employed for some other purposes, but there are decided limitations to the changes which may be made in war vessels, even though but little work has been done upon them. They might be converted into airplane carriers; but to complete them as capital ships, knowing that they will be obsolete when completed, shows a stubborn adherence to a fatuous policy which scarcely does credit to its supporters. Moreover, as I have stated, the determination to complete the 1916 program in its entirety will be regarded as a challenge to competitive armament, and will provoke resentment both in the Orient and in Europe. If we should narrow our program to the completion of the first group of capital ships and such smaller auxiliary ships are are called for in the 1916 program, there could be no criticism upon the part of other nations, nor would they say that we were seeking naval supremacy or offering a challenge to the naval powers of the world. It would bring reassurance to other nations and smooth the way to an international understanding or agreement looking to world disarmament.

Perhaps that which has been expended would not be entirely lost. The ships might now be fashioned, because so little has been done upon them, into craft for commercial purposes. It will be remembered that upon one of these ships the amount expended is less than 2 per cent of the cost. Undoubtedly there would be some temporary loss if suspension of work should now occur. Admiral Coontz indicated in his testimony that the contracts for the construction of these ships have in the main been—

Let to big concerns * * and the greatest loss would be in the holding up of the contracts * * *. I understand that a number of our biggest concerns are practically depending upon these to tide them over until they get more work, and that would be practically the principal effect of it.

In other words, if there should be a suspension of work upon those ships mentioned in my amendment, the principal effect would be that the "big concerns" which are relying upon the Government to furnish them "work to tide them over" might sustain some loss of profits. Of course, the Government must deal fairly with all persons and carry out its contractual obligations. But some of these ships are being constructed in Government yards, and those constructed in private yards are being built under contracts which provide that the contractors shall receive a certain per cent by way of profit, based upon the cost of the ships. Undoubtedly, if the ships are completed, the builders will receive larger commissions. The contracts are fashioned somewhat upon the theory of the cost-plus contracts, so prevalent during the war and which have been the prolific source of waste and extravagance. The Government has the right to cease work upon these vessels and no legal or moral obligation would be violated; so there can be no sound or valid reason urged against suspension of construction, based upon the theory that such a course would involve a violation of a contract.

We know that the corporations which have built battleships and warcraft for the United States have made enormous profits; indeed, in many instances the builders have been profiteers. I confess that while in my opinion those who are building these war vessels are in no position to complain if work upon the ships should cease, the remarkable solicitude which is sometimes exhibited for some of these corporations which have profited so much in the construction of armor plate, munitions of war, and war vessels excites a feeling of surprise.

The situation demands an exhibition of greater concern for the people who pay the taxes, and for the Government which is too often the victim of raids and exploitation. Corporations have been building warships at enormous profits, and their profits will be diminished if my amendment were to prevail; but, as the admiral says, the "probable principal effect" of suspension will be a loss of profits to such corporations. But there would be compensation in that event, even though at a later period new contracts for construction were required. These contracts have been let upon either war price levels or upon price standards but slightly below those existing during the war. We all know that steel was too high. We all know that the prices paid for steel and other commodities during the war period and at the time when these contracts were entered into were entirely too high. There must be a reduction. Moreover, the contracts were based upon wage standards of the war period. Wages will fall, and if war vessels must be built, there is no question but that they can be constructed at lower prices than those called for in the contracts under which these vessels are being built.

But, Mr. President, there is another phase of this question which demands consideration. The war has taught the limitation of capital ships in naval warfare and the vital importance of submarines, aircraft, and mines, and torpedoes, and poison gas. The 1916 program was a pre-Jutland program. It called for vessels of the pre-Jutland type. That is the reason I say it is archaic and the capital ships provided for will be obsolete when completed. The strongest defender of the capital ship is compelled to concede its impotency as a fighting ship unless it has a flotilla of auxiliary and other craft for its protection. If the defense of our coast is what we desire, but few battleships are needed. If a navy for offensive purposes is required, we must have those fighting forces and instrumentalities which the war has brought into such remarkable prominence.

Instead of expending between four hundred and five hundred millions upon the battleships and battle cruisers mentioned in my amendment, and work upon which I urge should be suspended, I would devote the sum, or a portion of it, in the event of our inability to secure an international agreement for a limitation of armaments, to the construction of two or more ships of the super Hood type and a considerable portion to the construction of a higher and better type of submarine than that which we possess, and the construction of airplanes and airplane carriers and the production and development of torpedoes and poisonous gases.

There is in Great Britain to-day a violent controversy between the Admiralty and naval experts as to the value of the capital ship and as to the future of naval warfare. Rear Admiral S. S. Hall, one of the most eminent naval officers and experts, in a letter to the London Times January 10 of this year

My argument is that there is no such thing now as a capital ship; the present so-called capital ship is a fraud. She is certainly the most powerful surface ship, and in the last war our grand fleet was the dominating factor, if you like, but it was certainly not the arbiter of the sea conflict. The vital sea conflict that went on without ceasing certainly for two years was a submarine war on our trade. It very nearly succeeded, and the grand fleet took no part in it. It was checked by various other means, and because of the reasons I have given, which can not occur again; but it was never stopped, and a very large submarine fleet was in course of preparation when the enemy suffered military defeat.

The advent of submarines inevitably produces a condition of stalemates at sea; you can never insure clearing the sea of submarines, and, therefore, attacks on trade will persist, whether you annihilate the enemy's surface fleet, distantly blockade it, as in the last war, or even if he has none at all.

He denounces the policy of "holstering up of the so-called

He denounces the policy of "bolstering up of the so-called capital ship," and insists that there should be a navy more mobile and economical, "available for attack or defense and not equipped purely for a battle which may never take place and which will be indecisive if it does."

Sir Percy Scott, to whom the Senator from Washington referred the other day, is regarded by naval authorities the world over as one of the most eminent in his line. In a letter to the London Times on January 8 of this year he said:

I have been able publicly to ask the question, What is the use of a battleship? This question I ask in perfect sincerity, and I ask it for the benefit of the nation, because I think we ought to have an answer before we build any more battleships. I have been trying to answer it for about eight years, but under the altered conditions of naval warfare I can not see what rôle the battleship can play in future wars, and I have not been able to find anyone who can tell me.

Sir Percy Scott further states:

In trying to arrive at the utility of the superdreadnaughts we must bear in mind that the earliest date on which the first one could be completed is the summer of 1923, and we must consider what improvements will possibly be made in the new weapons during that time. One thing that I think we can make sure of is that all sea-girt countries will secure themselves against attack by building submarines and airplanes, and that they will devise a torpedo carrying a charge of T. N. T. sufficient to blow the bottom out of our £9,000,000 battleships.

Admiral Freemantle, another distinguished naval officer of Great Britain, in a letter to the same paper under date of January 3, states:

I certainly would not advocate a program of £9,000,000 battleships in competition with America, but I would urge every recourse to experiments both with aircraft and submarines.

Admiral Sir Rother Grant, in a letter to the same paper under date of December 29, 1920, states that "the embarkation on a program of huge and costly capital ships is to be deprecated," and charges that "it is at least doubtful that money spent on capital ships at the present time is wisely spent."

Sir Percy Scott, in replying to an inquiry, states that-

The German fleet locked itself up in the harbor for fear of submarines, but if the war had gone on a little longer this fleet in the supposed safe harbor would have probably suffered very much, not from our battleships but from torpedoes dropped from airplanes. We were, unfortunately, a little late in having this new arm ready.

Commander W. P. Koe, in a letter to the same paper under date of December 22, 1920, states:

In this "great ship" business, with its rumors of stupendous craft armed with gigantic guns and protected with tremendous armor, costing untold millions of pounds apiece, it certainly looks very much as if our old friends, the "materialists," had gained the upper hand in the inner council of the staff, though the inference may seem hardly justifiable to those who are not thoroughly conversant with the internal economy of the staff and know little of the characters and idiosyncrasies of the body of officers composing it.

Commander J. Honner, in a letter dated December 20, 1920, states:

Do not use up financial resources in £8,000,000 ships when you can reconstruct at least eight ships fit for all service at the present for the same amount. Spend all that can be got on the ribs of the backbone. I venture to think that such a policy will keep us in the first place of the first-class naval powers—whatever the cost, a position the Empire will not tolerate the loss of.

A flag officer, writing to the Times under date of December 16, 1920, declares that-

The degradation of the battleship from her former pride of place as the supreme fighting integer of a fleet has been steady and progressive ever since the invention of the Whitehead torpedo. * * * Then came the submarine, and with its introduction the battleship became just as much afraid of being outside her base in the day as in the night. When she ventured into the North Sea at all in the late war, she rushed about at full speed, in constant apprehension of this new and invisible danger, and hurried back to shelter without delay when her immediate duty at sea was over. A hundred years ago the ship of the line would heave-to close off an enemy's port and lie there for days, so long as it was not a lee shore. Nowadays the vicinity of an enemy's port is the last place her successor is ever to be found.

We are constantly being told as a reason for building more of them that the capital ship was the foundation of our sea power in the late war. So she was, but only because the enemy's sea power took the same form. If the Germans had devoted the forty millions which they spent on this class of vessel to constructing submarines instead, they might have possessed some three or four hundred of all sorts and sizes of the latter, in addition to the few that they did possess, and in that case Great Britain and her allies would most certainly have gone under.

Other naval officers have given the same testimony, and attributed the triumph ultimately of the allied and associated powers to the failure of Germany to devote more of her resources to the construction of submarines.

Capt. W. H. Sayres declares that-

From present experience, ultimately the submarine will be developed to such a pitch of perfection that no purely surface-bound craft will be able to face it in war.

Rear Admiral Hall, in a letter to the same paper, dated December 14, states:

I claim that a naval policy based upon aircraft and submarines affords us the only hope of protecting our trade—the main purpose of our fleet—and that such policy will save us many millions on other estimates besides the naval ones, and will insure us a reasonable hope of command of the air in the next war, without which all effort will be

He further states that Lord Jellicoe declared that-

By reason of the submarine campaign in the last war we were closer to ruin than we have been for 200 years.

The same officer says:

The same officer says:

It is my firm belief, and that of many others, that had Germany employed her submarine torpedo vessels against our surface war fleet and equipped a proper submarine cruiser fleet for a war on commerce she would have won the war. Our enormous auxiliary patrols, consisting of weakly-armed vessels spread out without support, would have been rapidly wiped out in detail, and it would have been impossible to find protection for our convoys, which would have had to be universal and open to attack all over the world. A submarine cruiser of about 3,000 tons can be given a sea endurance of 50,000 miles and six months.

In 1914, which was before the present development of the submarine, Sir Percy Scott, the greatest English naval expert, wrote to the Times and emphasized the importance of submarines and aircraft in naval warfare. He said:

(1) That these weapons had entirely revolutionized naval warfare.
(2) That if we were at war with a country within striking distance of submarines, battleships on the high seas would be in great danger.
(3) That if we went to war we should probably lock our ships up in a safe harbor, and that the enemy would do the same.

This statement was prophetic, for that is precisely what Great Britain and Germany did.

(4) That no fleet could be hidden from the airman's eye.
(5) That submarines could deliver a deadly attack in broad daylight.
(6) That battleships could not bombard an enemy's port if it was protected by submarines.
(7) That the enemy's submarines would come to our coasts and destroy everything they could.

(8) That the submarine had driven the battleship from the ocean.

That remarkable prophecy was made in 1914. The develop-ments since that time vindicated the prescience of that distinguished naval officer. He foreshadowed the importance of the submarine, but the British Admiralty resisted his views and sought to weaken his position. Naval boards unfortunately clung to obsolete types and seem irresponsive to the progressive movements and the new developments in naval warfare. I might say it is to be regretted that they were not more fully accepted by our Navy Department.

He also declared that-

The introduction of the vessels that swim under water has, in my opinion, entirely done away with the utility of the ships that swim on the top of the water. * * With a flotilla of submarines * * * I would undertake to get * * * into any harbor and sink or materially damage all the ships in that harbor. If, by submarines, we close the egress of the North Sea and Mediterranean, it is difficult to see how our commerce can be much interfered with.

I have said in this discussion that I was in favor of a modern and an efficient Navy, and I have insisted that the 1916 program would provide an archaic and obsolete Navy. I have contended that if no international agreement for disarmament is reached, that we should have the most efficient Navy in the world. I believe that the submarine is a most important factor in naval warfare and that its importance has not been sufficiently recognized by the Admiralty of Great Britain or the naval authorities in the United States. Perhaps the natural conservatism of the Navy to which Admiral Sims referred constitutes the raison d'être for their attitude. In testifying before the House Naval Affairs Committee on the 4th of February of this year Admiral Sims, referring to this opposition to the submarine, said, speaking of our Navy and of the English officers:

Nobody in the Navy, or rather no admiralty or any such body, understood the submarine and its qualifications in 1914. * * * I looked up the records of the reports of boards and of the principal European officers and of some American officers, and I did not find anything enthusiastically in favor of submarines. On the centrary, I found almost universal condemnation of the submarine. According to those reports, it was a thing that could perform "circus stunts in fair weather." * * When the Audacious was torpedoed off the northwest coast of Ireland the British Admiralty made a minute investigation of the western coast of Ireland and of Scotland to see where the submarine's base was. * * Much less did they imagine that they could operate at a distance of 300 miles off the western coast of Ireland and the larger ones even remain three months in the neighborhood of the Azores. * * That remarkable man, Von Tirpitz, insisted on building 800-ton submarines so they could go to sea. He said that they could go to sea, and he sent a dozen of them into the North Sea, where they stayed for two weeks and came back in good condition. They knew that they could do that at a time when we did not know it.

Speaking of aviation, he said that-

If a battle should take place to-morrow involving the British Fleet, believe that aviation would be of more than equal value with the

I referred to the expert testimony concerning the inability of an attacking fleet to reach our shores. Admiral Sims testified before the Senate committee that-

No battleship can approach any coast, even with bombing planes, if the country has an adequate air force to wipe out the enemy air force.

He further declared that-

We ought not to spend one cent for fortification unless it is for fortification for the purpose of assisting the fleet.

Let me add that I hope when the Appropriations Committee reports the fortification bill, carrying, as it usually does, millions of dollars, they will remember the testimony of Admiral Sims, and I hope the Senate will heed this testimony and reduce the amount of appropriation usually carried for fortification purposes.

He made it clear in his testimony that by reason of the submarine and the airplane and the new developments in war that the capital ship is not the important factor in naval warfare that it formerly was. He testified that-

Great Britain with all ber force could not attack this coast without a base on this side to operate from. She has not a single ship that can come across the seas and get back again, let alone stay here without

He referred to the airplanes and the submarines developed by the European nations and stated that-

The airplanes that they developed on the other side in many respects are vastly superior to anything we have over here. I can almost say that ours are ludicrously inferior.

He referred to a metal plane purchased from a German company, and the German plane carried a thousand pounds of mail from Long Island to Washington and expended 7 pounds of gasoline, whereas the American plane with 2 engines, each of 400 horsepower, was to carry 800 pounds of mail over the same route, and it used 56 pounds of gasoline. The German plane had only 160 horsepower. He also states that all of the submarines built on the other side are very much superior to ours. There is no question about that in spite of what any official reports may say.

Those are the words of Admiral Sims. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], at the time Admiral Sims gave that testimony, inquired whether they were superior to those we are now building, and in reply Admiral Sims said:

They are superior to those we are now building.

Mr. President, I have consumed more time than I had intended to occupy, and therefore will but briefly refer to what might be denominated the mechanical aspects of our submarines and airplanes. Admiral Fullam has directed attention to the nature of our submarines and their imperfections. My information is that the criticisms of Admiral Fullam are entirely justified. Indeed, I think he has not revealed all of the weaknesses of our undersea craft. In my opinion we should suspend further work upon submarines until a full and complete investigation is made of the defects of those which we have and the weaknesses of those which are being constructed. I think that all fair and expert testimony will establish the fact that our submarines are not comparable to those constructed by Germany, and the testimony seems to be beyond question that our airplanes are inferior to those built by Germany and perhaps by other European nations.

Only a day or two ago a great tragedy occurred and the lives of seven splendid men were lost. This and many other fatalities should arouse Congress to the necessity of making radical changes in dealing with the broad subject of aviation. There must be an entirely different policy adopted not only with respect to the construction of lighter-than-air craft for fighting purposes, both upon land and upon sea, but in respect to the control of the entire subject. There must be coordination and the various aviation activities consolidated and brought under unified control.

We have spent $130,000,000 for submarines and have but one submarine ready for sea service with the fleet. We have had so many investigations that perhaps Congress and this country are tired at the very suggestions of further investigations of executive agencies and departments, but I submit that there should be a thorough and exhaustive investigation not only of the policy and activities of the Government with respect to aviation but also concerning its submarine program, and particularly the character of the submarines which have been and are now being constructed. We are now building a large number of submarines at Portsmouth, and the Electric Boat Co. is building for the Government some at Quincy and at San Francisco. Many of the submarines constructed by the Electric Boat Co. have been defective and the machinery placed therein has not been satisfactory.

The present bill carries several million dollars to "reengine" some of these submarines. I have here a list of the submarines under construction which ought to have been completed in 1919. It is impossible to determine when they will be completed. The machinery in some has been so imperfect as to prevent the use of the submarines, and many of them are still tied to the Many of the types known as the S-3 have had numerous difficulties with their engines. Some have shown their inutility when submerged because of the lack of stability and the improper arrangement and size of the rudders. Notwithstanding the defects in this type, 30 additional submarines similar to the S-1 type have been ordered from the Electric Boat Co. Defects in the propelling engines are manifest, and the power of many of them is wholly inadequate.

There are approximately 166 submarines built or in process of construction. Many are of the old type and are suitable only for harbor defense. Of the latter class, there are 16 of the old type, having a surface displacement of 450 tons. There are 27 of the R class, of about 500 tons displacement, and 12 of the S class, of 800 tons displacement. The T class comprises boats of 1,200 tons displacement. As I understand, two of this class have been delivered; the third is being constructed. There are three of the V class. They are of 2,000 tons displacement, There are six vessels of this type authorized but have not been contracted for. Bids, I am advised, were requested a year ago. The Lake Co. has built a few boats which are very satisfactory.

Speaking of the submarines, the Washington Post in its issue of the 20th of May of this year states that nearly 50 submarines are carried in the second-line list, and that there are also a large number of minor vessels rated as of little military value. In my opinion the submarine branch of the Navy Department has suffered from multiplication of authority. There has been no unified or centralized control, and the morale has suffered, and more or less of confusion, if not of demoralization, in all branches connected with the devising and production of submarines has existed. I believe that too little attention has been paid to the practical men and to officers who have had experience with submarines. There has been a disinclination to accept the suggestions of those who have seen service, with the result that there has been no progressive development. Conflicts over jurisdiction between the various bureaus that have been concerned in the final production of submarines have occurred and designs have been constantly changed, resulting in delay and unnecessary cost.

In some cases scores if not hundreds of changes have been made after construction has been begun on the boats. This has resulted in delay and multiplied the costs. Often new boats have been tied to the docks in navy yards for most of the period of six months between the preliminary acceptance trials and the final trials. Alterations and repairs became necessary because of defects, and the boats were thus held at the docks instead of cruising at sea in order that their capabilities might be discovered. My information is that often work well advanced has been turned out and replaced by new designs which in turn have been removed only to be supplanted by the original mechanism. Defects exist not only in engines but on some of the boats the motors, periscopes, and torpedo tubes are unsatisfactory. There have been failures of steering gears as a result of which the safety of the boats and their crew has been jeopardized. It is claimed by some that the double-hull submarines designed by the Government lack stability for safe submerging operations. It is known that the S-5 was lost off Delaware Capes. A number of boats now under construction at Portsmouth Navy Yard will be delayed two years after the time limit of their completion because of defective engines. Some of the boats are of a type which is dependable for coast defense; but they can not be of service at sea or for offensive work. The limited radius of action prohibits operation at any considerable distance from their base. Moreover, the torpedo tubes are too small compared with later types. I have referred to the 12-S type, 800-ton boats, built at the Portsmouth Navy Yard, of Government design. I believe that a comparison of the boats with the original designs will show remarkable dissimilarity.

I appreciate that between the time of designing the boat and building it the progress of naval construction would materially advance, occasioning important changes, but an examination of these boats and the changes from the original design would seem to indicate a lack of definite policy or design at the outset, and it is claimed that the excessive costs and the great amount of time consumed in their construction has resulted from the lack of an accepted and completed design. It is also contended that some of these boats are too unstable for safety and have a narrow margin of safety in reserve bouyancy. All of the boats of this type are underpowered and are exceedingly slow and possess impaired maneuvering ability. The engines are of a type not up to specifications and have been rerated, a lower horsepower being affixed than that designed, and in their operations now there has been a reduction of revolutions and power. The boats possessing the Nelsco engines have been unsatisfactory from an engineering point of view. They are useless as fleet submarines and I think the engineering record will reveal serious imperfections in their engines.

There are no mine-laying submarines and but one competent for fleet service. I repeat that an investigation should be immediately undertaken, of the entire submarine situation. I hope that the Committee on Naval Affairs will, at an early date, make an exhaustive inquiry into this important matter. If it does not do so, I shall feel warranted in offering a resolution asking for such investigation.

There are other matters in connection with the Navy and our naval policy which deserve consideration, but I shall omit their discussion at this time and soon yield the floor.

We spent between 1884 and 1920, more than $6,000,000,000 for our Navy and within a few years it will be entirely obsolete. The cost of building and maintaining a Navy will be infinitely greater in the future than in the past. The battleship South Carolina, which was built in 1910, when completed cost but $6,000,000 and the Indiana but three millions. Twenty-three battleships built between 1895 and 1908 cost $139,000,000 only. But the 12 battleships which we are now projecting and the six battle cruisers called for in the program under consideration, with the necessary auxiliary ships, will cost in excess of $1,000,000,000. Military and naval appropriations under modern conditions are so stupendous that few can appreciate them, and all bow beneath their crushing weight. All the wars of the world, from 1793 to 1860, cost but $9,243,000,000, and all the wars of the world from 1861 to 1910 cost $14,000,000,000. The direct financial charges of the World War will exceed $200, 000,000,000. The Revolutionary War cost but $170,000,000, and the War of 1812 but $119,624,000. The Mexican War, important as it was, called for an appropriation of $173,298,000. For the Civil War, the United States appropriated $3,478,000,000. These sums are insignificant measured by our financial contributions to the great World War, and they are unimportant in comparison with the military and naval budget which will be required in the United States within the next few years if we are to persist in the policy which seems to find support in administra-

I protest, Mr. President, against this policy and against this wanton waste which finds expression in this bill,

We are daily called upon to appropriate millions of dollars. The administration which was pledged to economy seems utterly unable to meet the demands for Government aid or to limit appropriations within safe and rational limits. I can not understand the callous indifference of those charged with authority in the presence of the economic and financial dangers which are menacing the Republic. The professions so loudly made by Republican leaders in behalf of retrenchment and economy seem insincere in the light of the appropriations almost daily made by Congress and approved by the administration.

Nor does the party in power offer any plan to raise revenue to meet these constantly increasing appropriations. There seems to be an utter absence of statesmanship and competency to meet the pressing problems of the hour. On the 26th of last month the finance committee was considering an important measure, and a Mr. Miller was giving testimony. A Senator asked the witness whether he believed that taxes would be less than at present, and the witness replied: "I am very much afraid it can not be done, Senator." My distinguished colleague [Mr. Smoot] then stated, "Let me say to you frankly, that I think they will be increased." Mr. Miller then remarked, "I am sorry to hear it," and the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], added, "I am sorry to say it." And this reply provoked Mr. Miller to remark, "I am not so terribly surprised."

So, Mr. President, we are promised not only no reduction of taxation but an increase in the burdens of the people. The eloquent campaign speeches delivered by the President and the Republican statesmen and orators—that from the staggering burdens the people would be relieved, and that retrenchment and economy and efficient administration would follow a Republican victory—have proven to be only preelection promises. Were they made only for the purpose of securing victory? They were idle promises—empty promises. And Republican leaders are now confessing their inability to reduce taxes, and, indeed, proclaim that they will be increased.

The American people were taken up into a high mountain by Republican leaders and promised the rich valleys and the green fields below and unexampled prosperity if they would only fall down and worship at the shrine of the Republican Party. The deceived electorate are now awakening from this enchanted spell cast upon them, and as their eyes are opened to the true situation and they are permitted to realize what is actually in store for them they perceive how great has been their folly and how perfidious has been the course of their betrayers.

They were promised that the Government would take its hands off from business and that the currents of our industry and economic life would be permitted to flow uninterrupted throughout the land, bringing vigor and life and prosperity to every community and to every home. The disillusionment has come. A financial crisis has resulted from a Republican victory. Business is stagnant and the dread specter of complete financial disaster hovers over the land.

I regret, Mr. President, the serious conditions now confronting the American people. Democrat as I am, I hoped that the Republican Party would pursue a wise and prudent course and execute policies that would make for the advancement and prosperity of the people. I can not rejoice in the discomfiture which has come to the Republican Party, nor does it give me pleasure to learn that throughout the land under Republican administration there is want and industrial disaster. I should rejoice if prosperity should shine upon all. I should welcome the triumph of foreign policies, even though conceived and executed by a Republican administration, that would tend to world fellowship and to the promotion of the happiness and peace of this great Nation. I shall be glad to support Republicans if they will offer policies, economic, political, or otherwise, that will meet the situation and bring relief to the people of this Nation and to the world.

There are questions that rise above parties, and issues so great as to even outrun national lines and comprehend other peoples and other lands.

If the Republican Party will present comprehensive measures and bring to us policies which will give us domestic peace and prosperity and establish a true international spirit, they will receive not only sympathetic but active support upon this side of the aisle. The Democratic Party is confident of the ultimate triumph of its faith and believes that only through the principles of that party can this Nation realize the ideals and purposes of the fathers; but notwithstanding that faith, it will give loyal support to the party in power if it will sincerely, effectively, and patriotically address itself to a solution of the important and vital problems now confronting the Nation.

For days efforts have been made to reduce the appropriations demanded by the bill before us. The advocates of the bill have resisted these efforts and success has crowned their labors. The forces of the administration appear to be united in defending this bill. They will consent to no amendments, and they present a solid wall in opposing every attack made upon it. And the same may be said of substantially all measures which have been brought before us calling for appropriations and for the expansion of the authority and power of the executive de-

Mr. President, no argument which can be made will influence the advocates of this naval program. It will be jammed through the Senate by administration forces. Appeals here for economy and for a course that will conduce to world peace are all in vain. But there is a higher court. There are other judges, and to that court and to those judges we shall appeal. The American people, awakened to the dangers before them, will reverse the action of the Senate and this administration. They will prove that their vision is broader and their judgment sounder and their leadership surer.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, the pending naval appropriation bill has been before the Senate for a long time, and I know the Senator in charge of the bill is anxious to have it come to a vote. So I am going to detain the Senate only for a few minutes. I merely desire to address my remarks to the question of reconsidering the action by which provision for continuing the building of the dry dock at Charleston, S. C., was denied a place in the bill.

I was very much surprised the other day when the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. La Follette] referred to some remarks which had been made or were alleged to have been made by my predecessor, Senator Tillman. Those remarks were alleged to have been made in 1899 and in 1909; but it is hardly necessary for me to say that Senator Tillman did not believe in, encourage, or countenance "stealing" by anyone nor for any purpose, by any section or for any section. The expressions quoted by the Senator from Wisconsin were merely his blunt way of expressing his views of so-called pork-barrel legislation. The remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin are unkind, uncalled for, out of place, and are a gratuitous insult to the memory of a Senator who served in this body with distinguished ability and fidelity for over 20 years. Such remarks can not dim the memory of one who was so well known to a large majority of the Members of this body with whom he served, nor can it injure his record in the eyes of the country at large. The remarks of Senator Tillman showed to what extent factionalism and sectionalism were injuriously carried, and if one will study those remarks it will be seen that he was pleading against sectionalism and merely for justice. The grave should be left in peace.

Mr. President, I hope that the Senators who did not hear the speech of my colleague [Mr. SMITH] have at least read it. I feel that, if they have informed themselves, there will be no opposition to continuing the appropriation for the dry dock at Charleston which was made in 1918.

A great deal of misapprehension exists as to the cost of the dry dock at Charleston and as to the dredging necessary to make the dry dock accessible. I am not going to repeat all the figures which my colleague gave to the Senate, but those figures informed us that below Cape Hatteras, for a distance of about 2,000 miles, there are only two small dry docks, one at Charleston and one at New Orleans, and the latter one only a floating dock, whereas above Cape Hatteras, a distance of some 800 miles, there are 18 dry docks. I leave it to the good judgment of the Senate to say whether that is a fair distribution of the facilities that the Government ought to have. There is not a dry dock below Cape Hatteras anywhere near large enough to take care of the largest ships of the Navy.

Some misapprehension also exists as to the cost of the dredging, and some figures which have been presented to the Senate very misleading. I am also indebted to my colleague for the figures which I am about to quote. To go back a little, I do not claim to be an expert in the shipping business, and I must say that at first when I heard of the large figures in connection with the dredging I thought there must be some mistake about them. To a layman it would seem that a dry dock should be built near the ocean, where it could be readily accessible to vessels of the Navy. That would be the first impression we would have, but my colleague has furnished us figures showing that at Boston it is necessary to dredge for a distance of 7.5 miles, and the estimated cost of a 35-foot channel is $7,994,000. The estimated cost of the Broad Sound 40-foot channel at Boston, 2 miles in length, is $1,545,000.

Even at New York, where the distance from the navy yard to the sea is 24 miles, the cost of the dredging is estimated at $60,000,000. At Philadelphia the estimated cost of dredging is $10,920,000, and the length of the channel to the sea is 63 miles. At Norfolk, Va., which we thought was right on the ocean, the length of the channel is 11.75 miles, and the estimated cost of dredging is $4,039,000. At Charleston, the length of the channel is 15.5 miles, and the cost of dredging is estimated at $3,770,000, of which $995,296.49 has already been expended, and there are now existing contracts for $434,042.52.

It thus appears that over one-third of the cost of the dredging at Charleston has already been expended, and contracts exist calling for the expenditure of a considerable sum more. So, resident, we see that not only at Charleston, but at every place where we have a dry dock there is a tremendous expense involved for dredging; Charleston, therefore, being no exception to the rule.

Not only that, but I want again to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Government owns magnificent terminals up the river beyond the dry dock at Charleston, so that it is necessary for the dredging to be done in order to secure the full use of those terminals. My recollection is that the Government has spent $17,000,000 in building those terminals, which, it is said, are as fine as any terminals on the eastern coast. So, it seems to me, Mr. President, that the question of a dry dock at Charleston should be considered upon its merits, and that there should be no politics in it whatever.

Some remarks have been made about my vote on this bill. The House appropriated under the bill passed by it about $400,000,000 to continue the naval program and to support the Navy for the ensuing fiscal year. The Senate committee has reported amendments to the bill, adding about $100,000,000. voted for all that the House recommended, but have consistently voted against the increases proposed by the Senate committee. It is a mere question of opinion as to the size of the Navy we ought to have, but I deny that I am in favor of an inadequate Navy. I believe we should have a Navy commensurate with the interests, the power, and the dignity of the United States until disarmament can be brought about.

But it is a relative term here, whether there is an appropriation of $400,000,000 or $500,000,000. To my mind $400,000,000 is an enormous sum, and it does not mean that those who vote for that are in favor of a small Navy. The taxpayers of this country are entitled to at least some consideration.

I do not see any end to this expense of building navies, if we are going to keep on, unless we can get some agreement with the world to disarm. Assuming that we could build a greater navy than any other nation in the world, that would not give us supremacy of the sea, because we know that other countries could combine; and therefore we could not stop short of having a navy larger than all the other countries in the world combined if we expected to control the sea by force.

When we see the figures on the chart on the wall which some one has been kind enough to furnish, I think it is time for us to stop, look, and listen" about the taxes of the people of this country. When we view that red circle over there, and when we see that out of every dollar of taxes that the people of this country pay, 92.83 per cent goes to pay for past wars and preparation for future wars, to my mind it is time for us to call a halt.

Mr. President, I desire to introduce the figures of that chart in my remarks, showing where the balance of the dollar goes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

War:	er cent.
Present	69.81 $25.02$
Legislative, executive, and judicial	92. 83 3. 19 1. 01 2. 97

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, as I said before, this question should be decided upon its merits. I am as much in favor of economy as any man can consistently be, together with a view to efficiency in our Government. I try to vote that way; but I can not see any use in having ships unless we have some place to take care of and to repair them. It is about as much folly as buying automobiles and leaving them out in the weather. A ship might get injured in the southern waters, and before it could be towed to a dry dock it might sink. We certainly need some place below Hatteras where the largest ships of the Navy can be taken care of.

If this can be called pork-barrel legislation, as some try to dub it, I must say that the South is not even getting the feet of the porker. We do not get much of the hair, even. In this bill the House provides $40,000 for the continuation of dredging in Charleston, and the Senate, notwithstanding it has increased the appropriation something like $100,000,000, has not added one cent for that port. It reminds me of the Negro preacher. He preached a sermon one night, and he told his congregation that he had been preaching to them for about two years, drawing a small salary, doing the best he could to lead them in the right way, but now he said he had something else to talk about; he was going to talk about his pay. He said: "You know that I haven't been getting much pay here. It's true that when some of you farmers kill a hog you send me the feet, but hereafter I 'spec's to eat some of that hog higher up." So I think it is time now that the Republicans were giving us a little bit more of this pork, if they want to call it pork. Certainly we have not had much of it in the past, nor can we be dubbed pork-barrel grafters.

While the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] was talking so much about economy—so much opposed to this development in Charleston—I could not help thinking about the time when this last war broke out. I do not like to mention these things. I was reminded about the action of the boys in Union County, my adjoining county at home. When they called for soldiers that county furnished its quota from the volunteers. It was the first county in the United States, according to my recollection, that kept up its volunteer quota. Not only that, Mr. President, but when we remember the distribution of the congressional medals of honor, I believe only 52 of those were awarded, and my recollection is that the soldiers of South Carolina received 6 of those. The soldiers of that State were awarded more medals for bravery (notwithstanding we have a small population) than the soldiers of any other State in the

Not only that, Mr. President, but here for the last year or two, when we have been importuned for bonuses, and when there has been a great propaganda going over the country trying to bring pressure to bear upon Congress to vote bonuses for all soldiers who served in the late war, the South Carolina branch of the American Legion is the only branch in the United States that passed resolutions condemning the practice of bom-barding Congress. That action entitles the State of South Carolina to fair consideration and to just and honest considera-tion at the hands of the majority of the Senate, and the members of the South Carolina branch of the American Legion deserve the applause of the people of the whole United States for their dignified, manly, and patriotic acts. Their example both in war and in peace could well be emulated.

I know the Senate is tired and wants to vote on this bill, and do not propose to detain you longer; but I am going to leave this matter to the fair judgment of the majority of the Senate. I hope they have posted themselves better since their vote the other day, and I confidently believe that they will award us justice. I will say to them that in case another war breaks out, notwithstanding we have been neglected here in this way, they will find us doing our duty, as we did in the last war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, out of deference to the views of a number of Senators, I desire to divide my motion, and will therefore withdraw the original amendment and offer it in two forms. The first amendment I tender and ask the Secretary to

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated. The Assistant Secretary. On page 51, after the word "constructed," at the end of line 26, it is proposed to insert:

And excepting also battleships Nos. 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, and 54.

Mr. KING. Before a vote is taken, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll. The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst McCormick Simmons Harris Borah Broussard Calder Capper Culberson Harrison Heffin Smith Smoot McCumber McKellar Hitchcock Moses Nelson Newberry Stanfield Jones, Wash. Kellegg Kendrick Kenyon Keyes Sutherland Swanson Trammell Underwood Walsh, Mass. Warren Watson Ga Curtis Dial Norbeck Oddie Ernst Penrose Pittman King Ladd La Follette Fernald Watson, Ga. Watson, Ind. Fletcher Poindexter Pomerene Sheppard Shortridge Gerry Wolcott Hale Lenroot Lodge Harreld

Mr. STANFIELD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Townsend] is detained in attendance upon a committee.

Mr. CAPPER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] is detained from the Senate on account of a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Fifty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. King], which will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary. On page 51, line 26, after the word "constructed," insert "nor on battle cruisers Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, or 6 or upon battleships Nos. 4, 50, 51, 52, 53, or 54," so that if amended it will read:

Total increase of the Navy heretofore authorized, $90,000,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation can be expended except on vessels now being constructed, nor on battle cruisers Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, or 6 or upon battleships Nos. 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, or 54.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Assistant Secretary. On page 51, line 26, after the word "constructed," insert:

And excepting also battle cruisers Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, and 6.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, except the two heretofore reserved for a separate vote in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in accordance with my previous announcement, I would like to have the Senate consider the amendment found on page 23 of the bill, referring to the Charleston proposition, and I ask for a vote on that amendment. It is not necessary for me to restate to the Senate what I have already stated, and I will not take up the time of the Senate for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. Under the rules are we not required to pass first on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the procedure we are following. The question is on concurring in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, excepting the two which were reserved, and this is not one of them.

Mr. SMITH. Does the Chair mean that we will vote first on those which have not been objected to, and then that this item will come up after those have been disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the Senator reserve this amendment in Committee of the Whole for a separate vote in the Senate?

Mr. SMITE. Under the rules of the Senate it was not necessary to reserve the amendment for a separate vote. under the impression that in my remarks last Frida I had made that announcement, but it seems that it was not noted by the clerks at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to considering this amendment as reserved for a separate vote?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It was not reserved, but in view of the request of the Senator from South Carolina for a separate vote on it, I shall not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be considered as reserved. Mr. SMITH. I hope that my friends in the Senate will vote "nay" on concurring in the amcadment, so that the matter will

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the other amendments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KING. Was a separate vote reserved on the personnel feature of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state what amendments were reserved for a separate vote in the Senate.

The Assistant Secretary. The only amendments reserved were, first, on page 22, line 6, by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the amendment proposing to strike out "$7,500,000" and to insert "$9,000,000." The other amendment reserved was regarding section 18, which was added to the bill as in Committee of the Whole, and now there is a reservation as to page 23, line 13, the Charleston (S. C.) Navy Yard proposition.

Mr. KING. I was under the impression that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] had reserved a separate vote upon the personnel proposition. If he had not done so, I should have made such a reservation. If that has not been done, I ask that a separate vote may be had in the Senate upon that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. We had a roll call upon that, and I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, first, is on concurring in the amendments not reserved.

Mr. KING. As I understand the statement just made by the Chair, if that vote shall prevail it will include the personnel item, and in order to avoid acquiescence in the action of the committee on it I move that a separate vote be taken upon the personnel provision of the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I make a point of order against the motion. The bill is now in the Senate, and no reservation was made of that amendment for a separate vote.

Mr. KING. It is my understanding that you do not need in Committee of the Whole to make a reservation, that you have the right under the rules to ask for a separate vote in the

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the amendment touching the subject of the personnel is a Senate committee amendment. It is an increase of the item as it came over from the House. Would it be necessary, therefore, in order to have a vote upon it, to make a reservation? What we desire is a separate vote on the question of personnel, and as that was a Senate committee amendment, increasing the amount beyond that which was provided for by the House, I presume we are entitled to a separate vote in the Senate without having made a reservation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Utah specifically name the amendment, so that the Chair can recog-

It is the amendment referring to increasing the Mr. KING. personnel of the Navy from 100,000 to 120,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is no such provision in the bill,

Mr. President. There is no provision in the bill fixing the personnel. That is only affected by the amount of the appro-

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the amendment was to increase the amount of the appropriation. It did not apply to men. I am with the Senator from Washington on this question. I voted with him before, and intend to vote with him now, and I have no doubt the Senate will renew its former action and sustain the amendment. I think, however, that if Senators on this side desire to have a separate vote they ought to be allowed to have it.

Mr. BORAH. The amendment touching the question of personnel is found on page 30, in line 22. The question is upon the increase of the appropriation from $72,000,000 to $87,000,000, and upon that we desire a separate vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in the first place, before acting upon the request for a unanimous-consent agreement. I should like to understand what the ruling of the Chair is as to the status of amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole and of which no reservation was made.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course any Senator can ask for a separate vote on any amendment, whether a committee amendment or any other. All that is done by a reservation is to keep it from being concurred in en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has correctly stated the rule. Mr. POINDEXTER. Then the request of the Senator from Idaho for unanimous consent is not necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not. The first question, then, is on concurring in the personnel amendment, which the Secre-

Mr. BORAH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays-were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. Phipps], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Jones]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], but on this question in Committee of the Whole he voted "nay," and as I expect to vote "nay" I shall vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY (when Mr. Robinson's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Arkansas

[Mr. Robinson] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Over-MAN]. Not knowing how he would vote, in his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Caraway] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. TRAMMELL (after having voted in the negative). When I voted I failed to note the absence of my pair. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Colt]. absence I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and let my vote stand.

"yea."

Mr. GLASS. I find that I may transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. Culberson]. I make that transfer and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the following pairs:

The senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh];

The junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Owen];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. McKinley] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. New] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]; and

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLean] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment reserved will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary. The next amendment reserved for a separate vote will be found on page 22, line 6, where, on the report of the committee, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out "$7,500,000" and inserted "$9,000,000" under the heading "Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks."

The amendment was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment reserved will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary. The next amendment reserved for a separate vote is the amendment adding a new section to the bill known as section 18.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, that is the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar], which authorizes the reinstatement in the Naval Academy of 110 midshipmen, in case they shall be reappointed, who have been separated from the academy on account of deficiencies in their I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes have it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and navs were not ordered. The amendment was nonconcurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment reserved will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary. The next amendment reserved for a separate vote is known as the Charleston, S. C., Navy Yard amendment, inserting, on page 23, the following:

The expenditure of the appropriation of $1,150,000 for the construction of a large dry dock, navy yard, Charleston, S. C., continued in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, approved July 1, 1918, is hereby suspended until July 1, 1924.

Mr. SMITH. I merely wish to say that I hope my friends in the Senate will nonconcur in that amendment,

Mr. POINDEXTER. In order to have no misunderstanding, I should state that this is not the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina. It is the amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Senator from South Carolina is opposing it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On this question I call for the yeas and

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was nonconcurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole which were not reserved for a separate vote.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment originally printed in the bill at page 37, lines 17 to 21, which was stricken out upon a point of order made in Committhe of the Whole. I offer it now as an amendment to be inserted at the place where it was originally printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary. Insert in the bill at page 37, after line 16, a new paragraph, to read as follows:

The statutory limit of $300,000 for repairs and changes to capital ships of the Navy as provided in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, approved August 29, 1916, is hereby changed to $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on May 27, last Friday, my colleague [Mr. Overman], who is absent from the city at present, offered an amendment which was, upon objection made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Poindexter], held to be out of order. I have been handed an amendment which accomplishes the same purpose that my colleague had in view, and which it is claimed removes the objection offered by the Senator from Washington. I was requested to offer that amendment, and I do so out of courtesy to my colleague. I am not familiar with the question, and am offering it simply as a matter of courtesy to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the

The Assistant Secretary. On page 28, after line 8, insert:

The Assistant Secretary. On page 25, after line 5, lisert:

Provided, That no part of any sum appropriated by this act shall be used for the purpose of paying the salary or the back pay of any officer in any branch of the Navy for any period of service for which he has heretofore been paid in the rank or rating he then held and whose claim for the salary and back pay of his present rank rests on the fact that his appointment and promotion antedated the act on whose provisions the legality of his antedated commissions were based, unless and until the Secretary of the Navy shall first refer the legality of any such antedated commission to which his attention may be called to the highest legal authority to which he may so refer under existing law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is general legislation, that it changes existing law, and is, therefore, not in order on an appropriation bill. In substance it is the same as the amendment offered by the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Overman], to which a point of order was made, which point of order was sustained. There have been some slight changes made in the language of the amendment as now presented, but not affecting the ground upon which the point of order was based.

Practically the only change made in the amendment is that instead of subjecting the appointments to the review of the Comptroller of the Treasury it subjects them to the review of "the highest legal authority to which he may so refer under existing law." Requiring appointments to be referred to any Requiring appointments to be referred to any legal authority, conferring the power to review nominations for commissions in the Navy which are made by the President of the United States, is a change of existing law, and, in my opinion, is unconstitutional. I make that point of order also, if it may be made, or I point out, at least, that the attempt to restrict the authority of the President of the United States to make appointments for commissions in the Navy is unconstitutional, that it is a change in existing law, and is not in order upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am under the impression that the Senator from Washington misunderstands the purpose and the effect of the amendment. I think probably when the amendment was ruled out on a point of order on Friday last there was a misunderstanding on the part of the Chair also as to the purpose and effect of the amendment. I do not claim to be familiar with the circumstances which call for the amendment, but upon an examination of the Record I discover from the statements of the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Overman] this state of facts: We have been called upon very frequently to confirm en bloc a large number of Army and Navy appointments based upon the assurance-given, of course, always in good faith by Senators in charge of such confirmations-that the appointments were regular. It seems to have transpired with respect to several such nominations so confirmed en bloc that some of the appointments antedated, in one case to the extent of four years, the law upon which promotions were based. In that way such officers are enabled to draw back pay upon a basis which does not in fact exist. The sole purpose of the amendment is to have some sort of an investigation for the purpose of protecting the Government against paying such salaries and back pay in the case of officers who are not entitled in law to receive them.

I do not conceive, Mr. President, that this is new legislation, that being the ground upon which the Senator from Washington bases his objection. It is a mere limitation proposed to be put upon legislation embodied in the pending bill. It does not undertake to negative or to nullify any provision of the present law; it does not undertake to provide any new statutory enactment or regulation; but it simply provides that if certain confirmations shall be found to be irregular and promotions have been granted which were not based upon and not authorized by the law under which the officers were promoted, the Secretary of the Navy shall institute such investigation as may be proper and necessary for the purpose of ascertaining the facts and protecting the Treasury against the payment of such unjust and unearned salaries.

I trust that the Senator from Washington will not insist upon the point of order, and, if he does so, I hope the Chair will overrule the point of order. I think that clearly it is not new legislation. There is a clear distinction made in the rules of both Houses between new legislation and limitations upon legislation, and I think that distinction is made in this amendment. I rather think that was also true of the original amendment, but surely it is so of the pending amendment.

I hope the Senator from Washington will withdraw his objection and will permit the amendment at least to go to conference, where he may investigate the matter.

If it shall appear by reason of our effort here to save time by the confirmation of a mass of nominations en bloc that a mistake was made, and, as the result of the mistake, the Treasury of the United States will have to pay out money to some officer who is not entitled to it, does not the Senator think that we ought at least to investigate the matter before we finally dispose of the amendment? If he permits it to go to conference he can make inquiries of the Navy Department; and if the Navy Department shall say that there is no foundation for this amendment to rest upon, then the conferees will simply eliminate it; that will be all; but if it is found that the statement of the junior Senator from North Carolina with reference to some of the nominations is true, and that they are sometimes antedated four years beyond the time that they should have been dated, and, as a result of that, officers are entitled to draw back pay, based upon new commissions during that period of time instead of the pay that they were entitled to under the old commissions, that is a matter which should be corrected. The back pay should be based upon the new commission only from the date that that commission could legally issue and not be antedated back, as appears to have been the case in at least one instance, four years.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, this amendment does not relate only to back pay; it prohibits the payment of salaries or

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly. If the officer is not entitled to it, he will be prohibited from receiving it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment—I listened patiently to his statement—I have no objection to a most thorough investigation into this matter. there is any charge of impropriety on the part of the President of the United States in making appointments in the Navy, it ought to be investigated; but I am not in favor of undertaking to put the President of the United States under the supervision of some petty officer, vaguely referred to here as "the highest legal authority" to which it may be referred, which, I suppose, means the Attorney General.

The President can refer such matters to the Attorney General if he chooses; but to require that these appointments shall, as a matter of law, be subjected to the opinion of the Attorney General as to whether or not the President is acting within his rights seems to me to establish a situation which is entirely unreasonable and impracticable and ought not to be established. It changes the existing law in that respect, and I insist upon my point of order.

I will say to the Senator, so far as I have any connection with the matter as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that if he or his colleague will report to the committee any impropriety or irregularity in any matter of this kind I will take every step that is possible, so far as the committee is concerned, to investigate it. Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is wholly wrong in saying that there is any purpose or that the amendment would have the effect of invalidating an appointment made by the salary

Mr. SIMMONS. The purpose only goes to the question of salaries and back pay. Nobody would contend that we could in this way nullify an appointment by the President. Clearly, that would be, if that were the intent or purpose, new legislattion and obnoxious, therefore, to the point of order the Senator has made; but here the sole purpose is to protect the Government as to the salary and back pay of officers; it is merely a limitation upon the legislation; it does not affect, it was not intended to affect, and can not affect, the validity of the confirmation of appointments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have some amendments which I wish to offer, but before offering the amendments I ask permission to have printed in connection with my remarks some clippings which I have bearing upon the question of disarmament. To save time I will ask to have them printed without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, they will be printed in the RECORD.

The clippings referred to are as follows:

THE SENATE AND THE PEOPLE.

The senate is out of touch with the people. The harmony which prevalled during the war has been lost in these last few months of the peace, and to-day the thought and purpose of the Senate and of the people are flowing along two widely diverging channels. This division is due to public recognition of the needless scale of naval expenditure. The people who pay the taxes have learned to their amazement that last year out of every dollar of Government expenditure. 92 cents was spent in liquidating past wars and making ready for those of the future; and they have told the Senate in unmistakable fashion that Government expenditures must be reduced and that to their thinking the most effective and immediate, way to set about this is to cut down the military budgets. In spite of the fact that the Navy bill, as passed by the House, called for $400,000,000, or two-and-a-half times the peace time expenditure before the war, the Senate wishes to add $100,000,000 to that huge sum; so that, to-day if you please, after two-and-a-half years of peace, and with no possible enemy in sight; the Senate is seeking to burden our already overburdened country by imposing upon it an expenditure for the Navy for one single year, of about half a billion dollars.

The President has stated on various occasions that he is in favor of an international conference to secure a reduction of naval expenditures. The people of the United States have noted with deep satisfaction that the spokesmen for leading naval powers have welcomed this suggestion of our President, and they are curious to know why in the world the invitation has not been sent out. For answer they are told by various Senators that naval economy is an idle dream and that a conference just now to promote all-around retrenchment would be "premature"—premature for some mysterious reason which the public is not allowed to know.

The public, however, has a perfect right to make its own guess, and its guess is that the Senate is determined to jam through the construction of the whole of Senator Borah has the people behind him in his plea for an immediate international conference. The Senate should act accordingly, TOKYO, May 21.

People of Japan have shown themselves to be in favor of restriction of armaments, it was declared yesterday by Mme. Ozaki, wife of Yukio Ozaki, leader in the campaign against militarism in Japan. Her statement was based upon the results of a post-card vote taken in cities where M. Ozaki has spoken recently in his campaign against armaments.

"The facts are interesting and I think American characteristics."

armaments.

"The facts are interesting, and I think Americans should know about them," said Mme. Ozaki. "My husband resumed his lectures recently in the chief towns in the north of Japan, speaking in 15 cities in asmany days. At each meeting post cards were given out by which his auditors might express their views, and so far, out of 16,000 cards received, 93 per cent are in favor of an arrangement looking to disarrament. Five per cent are against such an agreement and the rest are uncertain. Votes from the cities of Kanazawa, Toshima-gawa, and Fukul are just coming in, and, if anything, the results are more conclusive than ever in support of my husband's principles. He is going to the city of Hokkaido next month, intending to remain there for 10 days."

The new Women's Peace Society, dedicated to furthering the peace movement especially by the promotion of an understanding between the United States, and Japan, held a meeting to-day. Mme. Ozaki employed in any manner to coerce or any pecuniary claim of any kind, class, or na firm, or corporation, or to enforce any claim of concession for or on behalf of any private of composition to the United States, and Japan on national policies.

Newspapers are continuing their advocacy of an armament agreement between the United States and Japan on national policies.

They declare that the two nations should hold a preliminary conference, believing that if an accord is reached concerning the policies to be pursued in the Pacific question the relative naval strength of the two nations can be left to experts.

[From an address by Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt at the convention of the National Women Voters' League, in Cleveland, from an Associated Press dispatch printed in the Washington Post on Thursday, April 14, 1921.

The people in this room to-night could put an end to war. There isn't an audience in the world that won't applaud him who talks of world peace. Everybody wants it, and everyone does nothing.

We are the appointed leaders. It isn't possible for us to see the horrors of the other side. We go on daily living in a paradise while tragic Europe tries to gather its ruins together.

We have waited too long, and we will get another war by waiting. Let us make a resolution to-night; let us consecrate ourselves to put war out of this world. It is necessary that we rise out of shallow partisanship, that we act as women. Let us tell Mr. Harding and the Senate that we expect action. Let us be silent no more! Let us join hands with everyone who wants to put this terrible war business out of the world. Men were born by instinct to slay. It seems to me God is giving a call to the women of the world to come forward, to stay the hand of men, to say, "No; you shall no longer kill your fellow men."

[From the Scientific American, May 14, 1921.] WHO IS DELAYING DISARMAMENT?

There can be no question whatever that the country at large was dumfounded to learn, as it did a few months ago, that over 90 per cent of the current national expenditures are to cover the cost of wars that have occurred in the past and that may occur in the future. It was this material fact as much as, and perhaps more than, the moral aspects of the question that produced the practically universal demand for a reduction of mayal and military estimates.

In response to the taxpayers, the Government, through its various representatives from the President down, has stated during the past few weeks that we must at any cost complete the three-year program, including the six ships of the Indiana class, although these last will cost about $250,000,000. At the same time, in answer to the wide-spread desire of American citizens that our President should take the lead in calling a conference to discuss disarmament, the people have been told that we can not afford to undertake disarmament alone, and that the President must be given time for due consideration of this matter before calling such a conference. Meanwhile Congress is voting that we spend about $400,000,000,000, for this year alone, upon our Nayy.

that the President must be given time for due consideration of this matter before calling such a conference. Meanwhile Congress is voting that we spend about $400,000,000, for this year alone, upon our Navy.

The astounding thing about the statement that we can not consent to disarm until other naval powers agree to do so with us is that the only other naval power that has hitherto surpassed us in strength not only commenced disarmament more than two years ago but has carried the thing to such an extent that, first, it is questionable whether to-day she equals us in the power of her first fighting line; second, it is certain that if we complete our three-year program in its entirety our Navy will exceed the British Navy in capital strength by at least 30 per cent; and, third, if we also round out our Navy, which will be a comparatively inexpensive thing to do, we shall exceed that navy in actual material strength by at least 50 per cent.

Startling facts, but true; for we must remember that the British first-line ships are obsolescent to-day, being with one exception from 5 to 9 years old, and that by the time the 17 capital ships which we have under construction are completed, the finest of her ships will be from 8 to 12 years old. The question which we wish to ask Congress on behalf of the people of the United States who wish for economy is, Why is it that, in making these Government statements that we must go slowly in calling for a conference of disarmament; no acknowledgment whatsoever is made of the fact that the biggest navy in the world has already made this enormous stride in this very direction? Surely this is a fact pregnant with meaning, upon which the people of America have a perfect right to be informed.

That we are not unduly stressing a minor point, but that we are laying our hand upon a most significant and elemental fact, is proved by the reply to a question raised in the British House of Commons on April 13 as to the number of vessels that had been removed from the naval lists of Japan, the

Mr. LA FOLLETTE: Mr. President, I have three or four amendments which I wish to offer and upon which I should like to have the yeas and nays. If I could be accorded a roll call on each of the amendments, I would be willing to forego their discussion. I send the first amendment to the Secretary's

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Reading Clerk. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new section, to be numbered section 18, as follows:

Provided, That no battleship, battle cruiser, scout cruiser, torpedo-boat destroyer, submarine, or airplane carrier herein appropriated for shall be employed in any manner to coerce or compel the collection of any pecuniary claim of any kind, class, or nature, of any individual, firm, or corporation, or to enforce any claim of right to any grant or concession for or on behalf of any private citizen, copartnership, or corporation of the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, at this point I ask for

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in the performance of the task of looking after the bill I am compelled to make a point of order against the amendment, for the reason that it changes existing law and puts a limitation upon the use of the naval forces of the United States, contrary to present law. I assume that that must be admitted; otherwise there would be no ostensible purpose in offering the amendment, if it were merely a repetition of existing law. I therefore make the point of order that it is not in order upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask to have the amendment again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTEDGE in the chair). The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The reading clerk restated the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Chair will permit me. I should like to call the attention of the present occupant of the chair to the ruling of Vice President Marshall upon this same amendment, which I proffered to the naval appropriation bill on July 19, 1916, and I should like to read the announcement of the decision of the Vice President upon the amendment which I offered at that time. This amendment is in form the same as the amendment then offered.

Sixty-second Congress, third session, dated 1919:

Mr. La Follette offered the following amendment: On page 172, line 13, after the word "paid," insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided. That no battleship, battle cruiser, scout cruiser, torpedoboat destroyer, or submarine herein appropriated for, shall be employed in any manner to coerce or compel the collection of any pecuniary claim of any kind, class, or nature, or to enforce any claim of right to any grant or concession for or on behalf of any private citizen, copartnership, or corporation of the United States against the Government of Mexico or of any Central or South American Government."

I have omitted the limitation following the words "United States" in the amendment as I have proposed it, but no one will contend that that in any way changes the parliamentary status of my amendment.

I continue to read from that page:

Mr. La Follette. Mr. President, I offer that amendment at this time.

Mr. Brandegee. I make a point of order against the amendment, that it is in violation of the rule which prohibits legislation upon an appropriation bill.

The Vice President (Mr. Marshall). The Chair is inclined to believe that if there can be a limitation upon an appropriation for the purposes for which the appropriation may be made there may be also a limitation upon the use of the article provided for in the appropriation. The Chair believes it is simply a limitation upon the bill and is not general legislation.

The Chair has listened to a good deal of discussion that has gone on during the progress of the bill with reference to the President of the United States being the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, as though the Congress of the United States had no power or authority whatever over the creation of an Army or the creation of a Navy, or any power with regard to determining anything that the Army or Navy should or should not do. There have been views expressed here that the President of the United States, can do anything he pleases with the Army and the Navy of the United States. The Chair does not know whether he has that power or not, but the Chair is clearly of the opinion that the Congress of the United States could provide if it chose for a Navy the sole purpose of which should be to guard the Panama Canal, or to create a Navy to guard the harbor of New York; it could create a Navy for the Atlantic or for the Pacific.

Clearly, in the mind of the Chair, it is not general legislation at all. It is simply a declaration, if the Senate wants to make it, that these battleships and battle cruisers shall not be employed for certain purposes. If the President of the United States has no power or authority to use any of the vessels of the United States to coerce or compel the collection of any pecuniary claim of any kind, class, or nature, or to enforce any claim of right to any grant or concession for or on behalf of any private citizen, copartmenship, or corporation of the United States against the Government of Mexico or against any Central or South American Government, this does not change it. If he has the power he can use whatever of the Navy there is now for that purpose. But the Chair is clearly of the opinion that if the Congress of the United States wants to prevent the use of these vessels for this purpose it has the right to do so, and it is not general legislation but a limitation upon the bill.

Mr. President, that decision is squarely in point. It is a

Mr. President, that decision is squarely in point. It is a decision of the Vice President. It is the latest decision made upon that point; and if there is anything binding in the precedents of the Senate, it settles the question which has been raised by the Senator from Washington, acting chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

For the present that is all I care to say.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have not the advantage of being able to turn to the volume that the Senator from Wisconsin has quoted. The volume that I have does not contain that reference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Would the Senator like to have this volume? I have read from page 114 of "Gilfry's Precedents and Decisions on Points of Order, United States Senate, Sixtythird to Sixty-fifth Congresses, inclusive."

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thank the Senator. I have just been sent a copy from the desk.

This amendment is clearly, in my opinion, Mr. President, legislation which goes beyond a mere limitation upon the appropriation contained in this bill, even though that, if it applied, would make it in order.

The amendment provides-

And so forth. Practically the whole Navy is herein appropriated for. The entire 1916 program is herein appropriated for, but these are only additional appropriations to those that have been made heretofore, and the vessels are in such a stage of construction that it will be necessary to make appropriations hereafter. So that this amendment, if it were adopted, would not only prevent and paralyze the executive branch of the Government in using the results of the appropriations contained in this bill for the purposes prohibited in the amendment, but it would have the same effect as to the appropriations contained in many bills passed in previous years and those that will be passed hereafter, because it is a continuing provision and is not by any means limited to the next-fiscal year.

My opinion is that the amendment is a most radical and far-reaching change in the existing law. The Army and Navy of the United States are back of the judicial processes and the governmental decrees of the Nation, and the purpose of maintaining them is to enforce the decrees of our various tribunals and to carry out the policies of the Government when they have been established through the proper agencies dealing with those various subjects. To undertake by a sweeping, unlimited provision to provide that the Nation's Commander in Chief, acting under the laws and under the Constitution, can not use the Navy of the United States because it happens to be appropriated for in part by this bill for the purpose of protecting the rights of our citizens, of enforcing those claims which in the carrying out of the policies of the Government may have been recognized by our Government as legitimate claims against some foreign Government or the nationals of some foreign country, subverts the existing law, to say nothing of changing it.

I fail to see how we can escape the conclusion that the amendment is subject to a point of order as general legislation, changing existing laws, and therefore can not be attached to an appropriation bill; and the circumstances which I have pointed out were not adverted to by the Chair in the previous ruling which has been cited by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, they were taken into consideration by the Presiding Officer, and an amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, which will be found cited in the same volume, which made the limitation a general one upon both the Army and the Navy, was held by the Vice President to be out of order and to be general legislation because it applied generally to the Army and the Navy. This distinction has always been preserved with regard to amendments of appropriation bills, that any amendment which imposed a limitation upon the appropriation should be in order, and the Chair can readily see the reason for the distinction.

The great danger which it was necessary to guard against in the rules was the enlargement of appropriations in appropriation bills, and therefore, in framing the rule, and in the precedents which were established from time to time, beginning at a very early date-it can be traced down through all of the decisions-it was found to be a sound practice to receive amendments to appropriation bills which cut off or limited the appropriations.

Therefore there grew up a long line of precedents which made amendments to appropriation bills limiting or restricting the appropriations in order, as against the enlargement of appropriations by amendment on general appropriation bills; and. Mr. President, I undertake to say that there can be no precedent found which contradicts, distinguishes, or in any way impinges upon or weakens the precedent which the Vice President wrote into the decisions of the Senate in 1916, when precisely the same amendment which is now before the Senate was offered to a pending appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair).

The present occupant of the chair has very great respect for precedents if the reasons given appear sound. The Chair also has very great respect for the opinions of the Senators who have spoken on this question; but with great deference to the precedents cited—and both are in mind—and with great respect for the opinions of Senators, the Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. It would serve no good purpose to enlarge and give reasons for this opinion. In a word, it is thought that the proposed amendment is most general in its scope and purpose; that in effect it amends or suspends or subverts many laws, and is general legislation. The Chair so holds. The point of order is well taken.

The bill is still in the Senate and open to amendment. there are no further amendments the question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

McKellar Stanley Sutherland Swanson Warren Borah Calder Heflin Moses Newberry Nicholson Norbeck Oddie Poindexter Sheppard Shortridge Smoot Stanfield Jones, Wash. Kellogg Kendrick Capper Curtis Watson, Ga. Watson, Ind. Willis Wolcott Keyes Ladd La Follette Dillingham Elkins Gerry Gooding Hale Harreld Lenroot McCormick McCumber

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. Kenyon and Mr. PITTMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. MYERS, Mr. KING, Mr. WALSH of Montana, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. CAMERON entered the Chamber and answered to their names,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in further commemoration of the ruling that has just been made, and that this day may be marked as a sort of milestone in the parliamentary history of the Senate, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

as follows:

Sec. 18. That no battleship, battle cruiser, scout cruiser, torpedobat destroyer, submarine, or airplane carrier herein appropriated for shall be employed in any manner to coerce or compel the collection of any pecuniary claim of any kind, class, or nature of any individual, firm, or corporation, or to enforce any claim of right to any grant or concession for or on behalf of any private citizen, copartnership, or corporation of the United States against a foreign Government unless and until the claimant shall have been denied a judicial determination of his claim by such foreign Government.

Mr. POLYDEY TEP. Mr. President I make the point of order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the proposed amendment changes existing law and is general legislation, not in order upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg leave to cite the decision of former Vice President Marshall, rendered on the date which I have already stated, July 19, 1916, at page 114 of Gilfry's Precedents, in support of the amendment being in order at this time. I take the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is very firmly of the opinion that the point of order is well taken. In order that the ruling may be historic, it might be proper to give some reasons for the ruling; but the present occupant of the chair thinks that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin can be easily differentiated from the amendment which brought about the ruling of the former Vice President, for whose opinion the present occupant of the chair has very profound respect. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In view of the fact that the amendment which I have offered is in the same language as the amendment upon which the former Vice President ruled, I find it somewhat difficult to apply the reasoning of the present occupant of the chair, but I take the opportunity to offer another amendment, which I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. The READING CLERK. At the end of the bill add a new section, section 18, to read as follows:

That no battleship, battle cruiser, scout cruiser, torpedo-boat destroyer, submarine, or airplane carrier herein appropriated for shall be employed in any manner to coerce or compel the collection of any pecuniary claim of any kind, class, or nature of any individual, firm, or corporation or to enforce any claim of right to any grant or concession for or on behalf of any private citizen, copartnership, or corporation of the United States where such claim is merely contractual, or where the claim is of a speculative character, or where the foreign sovereignty appealed to denies the validity of the claim.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment proposed, if agreed to, would change existing law; that it is general legislation; in fact, I may say that it would subvert, if enacted, the entire constitutional arrangements of the Government of the United States. It is not in order upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to say that it is in perfect harmony and consonance with the decisions of the Department of State, which I have here before me. The distinguished acting chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is manifestly quite misled and quite uninformed as to the character of the amendment. However, I take the ruling of the Chair upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion and holds that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. I.A FOLLETTE. I now offer another amendment, which I send to the desk

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The READING CLERK. Add a new section at the end of the bill, section 18, to read as follows:

SEC. 18. That no battleship, battle cruiser, scout cruiser, torpedo-boat destroyer, submarine, or airplane carrier herein appropriated for shall be employed in any manner to coerce or compel the modification of the constitution or the laws of any foreign Government which deprives such foreign Government of its sovereign right of exclusive jurisdiction over its own territory.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The amendment, of course, would have the effect, in so far as enactment of law by Congress could have effect upon the future course of the Government of the United States, of preventing the Navy of the United States from being used in a war against a foreign country in case we should become involved in war for the purposes prohibited by the amendment, which are very frequently the cause of war. I sincerely trust, as every other man of reason does, I believe, that we shall not become engaged in any such difficulties with any foreign country, but it is to guard against that very thing that the Navy is established.

I make the point of order that the proposed amendment changes existing law and is general legislation not in order upon an appropriation bill, and that it is subject to the rule which the Chair has already laid down with reference to three separate amendments which have just previously been offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I cite, in support of the amendment which I have offered, the ruling of Vice President Marshall on the 19th of July, 1916, and the long line of precedents in support of amendments limiting appropriations upon appropriation bills which have invariably been followed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, and so rules.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I now offer another amendment which shall send to the desk. I call attention of the Senate to the fact that it has been placed in evidence before the Senate in the course of the debate upon the pending appropriation bill that officers of the Navy and officers of the Army have, while drawing salaries from the Federal Government, accepted positions with armor-plate manufacturers or munition manufacturers who have contractual relations with the Federal Government, and that acting in the position of an employee of these private munition manufacturers and at the same time drawing salaries from the Federal Government, giving them influence and access to the department, these officers have been able to serve in that dual capacity to the very great advantage of the munition makers and armor-plate ring, of the existence of which I have in the course of this debate furnished abundant evidence to the Senate.

I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. It is a limitation upon the appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. At the end of the bill add a new section, section 18, to read as follows:

No money appropriated in this act shall be available or shall be paid to any member of the Navy on the active or retired list who shall be, either directly or indirectly, connected with or in the employ of individuals, copartnerships, or corporations which are engaged in the manufacture of supplies, ordnance, or materials of any kind which the Government shall purchase, or which submit bids or proposals therefor, or have or offer to have any contractual relations for the furnishing of supplies, ordnance, and materials to the Government.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the existing law provides as follows-and I am reading from Twenty-ninth Statutes at Large, page 361:

That hereafter no payment shall be made from appropriations made by Congress to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active or retired list—

That is better language than the language used in the amendment offered, which refers to them as members of the Navy

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is not the language. guage of the amendment I have offered is "any officer"

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was just going by what the Secretary read. Continuing the reading of the statute

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My amendment reads, "That hereafter no officer of the Army or Navy." If it does not, I should like to have it corrected.

Mr. POINDEXTER, I should like to know who has the

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not yet yielded the floor. Mr. POINDEXTER. Very well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to correct my amendment. have the printed amendment before me that I sent to the Secretary's desk, providing "That hereafter no officer of the Army or Navy," and so forth. I now yield the floor. I think I have my amendment as I wish to present it to the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Continuing the reading of the statute: While such officer is employed, after June 30, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war materials to the Government, and such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date.

That statute applied not only to the appropriation bill of that year but it was a continuing statute and is in effect today and now prohibits and makes unlawful, and consequently subject to criminal prosecution, those things which the Senator from Wisconsin said have been pointed out during the debate. Unfortunately

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I interrupt to inquire the date of

Mr. POINDEXTER. The date of it is 1896.
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. Will the Senator permit me to make a statement in this connection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I prefer, if the Senator will allow me, to conclude. I shall conclude in just a moment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be very glad to follow the

Mr. POINDEXTER. Continuing, I was about to state that the statute which I have just rend is now in effect and makes unlawful, and consequently under other statutes subject to criminal prosecution, any such actions as those which have been stated by the Senator from Wisconsin to have been taken by officers of the Navy. I think the law ought to be enforced. any of the officers have been guilty of violation of the law, they ought to have been prosecuted.

It seems to me that the amendment which is offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is a mere repetition of existing law, but I shall not make a point of order against it, and so far as I may I accept the amendment. I shall vote for it, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was aware of the existence of the provision to which the Senator has called attention. I was aware of another thing that I think perhaps he may have overlooked if it ever came to his knowledge, and that is, with that provision standing in the law, the Senate confirmed and put at the head of the Ordnance Department a man who was an active officer in the Army at the time and who at the same time was the patentee of an important mechanical invention, a disappearing gun carriage, and who had contractual relations with the Bethlehem Steel Co. on that patent.

The Senate Military Affairs Committee, with that provision standing on the statute books, reported against his confirmation, but, Mr. President, influences which are all-potent in some places in this country were sufficient to lead the Senate, in the face of that recommendation, to confirm that appointment and to install that man in that position. He held it for years, and I think has only recently been retired. So I thought it might be wholesome to reenact it and put it into an appropriation bill. I do not know that it will have any effect upon the Senate in the future any more than it had in the past. The Senate has a way of doing what it pleases, deciding what it pleases, making what precedents it pleases, changing parliamentary law as it pleases. It finds a way to do so when the reasons are weighty enough to bring about such a result; but, at the same time, I thought it might be worth while again to write it into the law. Therefore I offer the amendment. It is no more subject to a point of order than the other amendments which I have offered. Like the other amendments, it is a limitation upon the appropriation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin simply prohibits the payment of any portion of the appropriation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It does not fix any penalty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is to be regretted that provision is not made for imposing a penalty.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be very glad to accept such an amendment if the Senator from Montana will propose one, but. if the Senator will permit me, I am inclined to think that the milder the amendment is the greater the likelihood that it will be enforced.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not intend that anything that I said should be considered to be by way of criticism of the amendment offered by the Senator. I simply rose to call attention to the statute which was referred to by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Poindexter]. The association of an officer with any organization which is engaged in selling supplies to the Navy is in the highest degree reprehensible and ought to be penal offense. Apparently, however, the statute to which the Senator calls our attention merely declares the act to be unlawful. I was under the impression, as the Senator has asserted, that all acts declared in the statute to be unlawful were misdemeanors and punishable as such; but I examined the matter some time ago very diligently to find some such general provision in the statute, and I was not able to find it. Therefore question the statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My impression was that there was a general statute to that effect.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was of the same impression.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But I shall not assert that positively, because I have not sufficiently investigated the matter.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely call the attention of the Senate to the matter. I think that undoubtedly Congress intended to make the act a penal offense by declaring it to be unlawful, and it ought to be made a penal offense, but in view of the language used I question whether it is so. It is a matter which I think ought to engage the attention of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr.

LA FOLLETTEL

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate, and open to further amendment.

Mr. KING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 1 by adding, after the word "constructed," in line 26, page 51, the following:

Provided further. That no part of this appropriation shall be expended on any of the capital ships now being constructed that are less than one-third completed until and unless the plans and specifications therefor are so revised as to provide for armament which shall at least be equal to that planned for the most powerful type of vessel projected or in process of construction in other countries.

Mr. KING. Just a word, Mr. President. It is apparent that the Senate intends to force through the 1916 naval program. Attention has been called to the fact that our naval policy has caused a revision of the British naval policy and that Great Britain next year will begin the construction of four vessels larger than those provided for in our program. It must be apparent, therefore, if we are to have a proper Navy, one that is modern and adequate, that armament should be provided that will make our vessels as powerful as those of any other country. It would be absurd to complete the 1916 program only to have obsolete vessels. The ships now being built, which are not nearly completed, may be conformed to a type and possibly may be so changed as that they may have armament, including guns, to make them equal to the most powerful vessels afloat. If we are to continue the competitive policy with other nations, and if there is to be continued this militaristic spirit which has too often controlled nations in the past, then I believe that we should build a fighting navy-one that meets the highest standard of efficiency and modernness. I am for an adequate navy-not an obsolete, inefficient, and antiquated one.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, this amendment is along the line of several other amendments which have been offered by the Senator from Utah and rejected by the Senate looking toward the discontinuance of work upon the capital ships which are now under construction. The amendment provides that upon all of the capital ships that are less than one-third completed-and there are quite a number in that category-the moneys appropriated in this bill shall not be available for a continuance of work unless their plans and designs shall be so changed as to make them at least equal to the most powerful type of vessel projected or in process of construction in any other country.

Of course, Mr. President, the Senate and House of Representatives and the very able and noted naval constructors of the United States, who are at the head, I may say, of that profession, perhaps, want to get out of this construction program the best ships that it is possible to get, the most powerful and the most modern; but to undertake by legislation to say that if a ship is one-third or slightly less than one-third completed the work upon it shall be discontinued unless the plans are changed to make it equal to the most powerful ship afloat, would be to accomplish the very object which was the purpose of other amendments which have been offered by the Senator from Utah and to scrap a large part of our naval program. I do not know whether what the Senator proposes is possible in the case of a ship that is one-third completed. We do not know, in fact, no one has complete information as to the exact nature and power of the most modern and most powerful ships that are being projected and are being completed by other countries.

It has never been the policy of Congress, because it has never been practicable, and it is not practicable now, to undertake to lay down by law the details of the armor or the armament or the type or the design of ships for which it has provided. Such matters have always been left to the executive branch of the Government, because in their nature they are such as to require executive action; they must be left to the scientists, to the professional men. To change the policy now would have the same result in loss and injury to the Government that has prevented Congress in all the appropriation bills which it has passed in former years from putting into them any such limitation upon the discretion of the technical officers having charge of the expenditure of the funds appropriated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it would have been wise if there had been legislation in the past which imposed upon the Executive the duty when appropriations were made for the construction of battleships or other fighting ships to compel the naval authorities in the executive department to build the I called best battleships and the best naval vessels afloat. attention in the debate this mornin; to the fact that for years after the Monitor had been invented, which made the wooden ship absolutely useless, we continued to build wooden ships. I also showed that after the first dreadnaught, which was the invention of Lord Fisher, had been brought into commission by the English Government, we built a great number of battleships which were of no practical value and indeed were obsolete. It has been shown during this debate that, driven by our feverish haste to force through a policy calling fo: 156 ships, Great Britain will lay down next year four super Hoods each one of which will have a tonnage of 55,000 and will be more powerful than any vessel in the American Navy. Knowing that fact and having information that Great Britain has ships carrying 18-inch guns and will build warships carrying 20-inch guns, we propose to build archaic types that have only 16-inch guns and which will be inadequate to meet the British ships.

The amendment which I have suggested perhaps should not embrace ships which are more than 30 per cent completed. The argument of my learned friend from Washington would be potential and perhaps persuasive if I had attempted by my amendment to include all battleships in process of construction; but I have purposely drawn the line—perhaps it is an arbitrary one—at 30 per cent. Obviously these ships upon which only 30 per cent or less of the work has been performed can be changed or modified and if not they ought to be, so that they may when completed be the equal of ships of other nations. I do not hope, however, for this amendment to prevail, because the Senate has shown—and I say it with the utmost kindness—a blind obstinacy in its devotion to the 1915 pro-

Mr. POMERENE. The 1916 program.

Mr. KING. My friend the Senator from Ohio says the "1916 program"; but it was devised in 1915 and crystallized into law in 1916—which when it is completed will furnish us obsolete ships.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. The Reading Clerk. On page 51, line 26, after the word "constructed," it is proposed to insert the following:

And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended on battleships No. 49, No. 50, No. 51, or No. 52, or upon battle cruisers No. 2 or No. 4, until it is demonstrated by adequate sea tests of battleship No. 45 that the propelling machinery projected for such vessels will produce the maximum battle speed contemplated in the plans and contracts for the construction of such vessels, and until such fact is certified to the Navy Department by the President of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in the discussion a few days ago I called attention to the fact that the electric drive of the battle-ship Tennessee had occasioned some trouble; that, notwith-standing the fact that the Tennessee was commissioned a year ago, there were major defects in the machinery which had prevented the acceptance of the ship, or, at least, had prevented the final test from being made until a few days ago. My information is that we are constructing other ships of the same type and with the same type of electric drive. If the drive is defective, if the machinery in the Tennessee possesses infirmities so vital as to require one year after it was commissioned to demonstrate whether or not it would be accepted, it seems to me wise to prescribe that no machinery of the same character shall be put into other vessels until the President shall certify that after test they will attain the maximum strength for which the contract calls.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I trust this amendment will be voted down. It is subject to the same objections that were pointed out to the last amendment.

As to the Tennessee, since the debate on the subject the other day I have received information that the Tennessee has not only complied with all of the requirements laid down for her construction but that she has surprised them, and probably there is no ship afloat in the world to-day that is superior to that vessel. She is fully equipped, fully prepared for every service for which she was constructed, and I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. King].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. The Reading Clerk. On page 51, line 26, after the word "constructed," it is proposed to add the following words:

And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended upon battle cruisers No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, No. 4, No. 5, or No. 6, or upon battleships No. 53 or No. 54 until and unless the specifications of such vessels are revised to provide guns of equal caliber and projection to the best guns being provided for the naval vessels of any other country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course this amendment, as well as others which seek to limit appropriations or change the bill, will be voted down. We profess devotion to a naval policy which will give us a well-balanced and efficient Navy, and yet, with the knowledge that one other nation has guns of greater strength than those which we possess and those which we propose to place upon the vessels which we are to build at a cost of hundreds of millions, we blindly follow a program antiquated and infirm, and refuse to adopt any suggestion to modernize it and make it an adequate Navy.

I repeat that this amendment is merely for the purpose of giving us, if we are to have a Navy, as good guns, as powerful guns, as any navy afloat. Of course the Senate will vote it down. It has already shown that it desires an old-fashioned Navy, not a modern one.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there are many things besides caliber that affect the efficiency of guns; and the fact that the amendment is drawn in this form—probably none of us here could draw it any better than the Senator from Utah has drawn it—indicates how incompetent Members of the Senate who have not studied ordnance and guns would be in undertaking to define the specifications of the great guns of the American fleet. We have to judge by results, and we know and believe that the guns which have been produced by the Navy Department are the equal of those of any other navy in the world; and of course the Navy Department are going to provide for these ships the most efficient guns that it is possible to manufacture. To limit them, and prescribe their discretion and authority by a crudely drawn amendment of this kind, would defeat the very purpose which the Senator from Utah has in mind.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington has in view any other characteristics or attributes of the guns which would add to their efficiency and make them stronger, I shall be glad to have him add them to the amendment; but heretofore the test of the strength of guns was the caliber. We had 8-inch guns and 6-inch guns and 4-inch guns and 10-inch guns and 12-inch guns, and when we reached the 16-inch gun many naval constructors thought that the ne plus ultra had been attained; but we have information that Great Britain has an 18-inch gun and projects 20-inch guns. If the test of the strength of the gun is the caliber, obviously the 20-inch gun or the 18-inch gun would be better than the 16-inch gun. This amendment, if adopted, would not be satisfied by the construction of guns which had as great caliber as the guns of other nations if they were, notwithstanding that fact, inferior thereto.

The amendment calls for guns as strong and effective as those of the most powerful navy in the world. If the Senate does not want the most powerful guns in the world, but wants the obsolete Navy of 1916, of course it will vote down my amend-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah, which has been stated.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am tempted to offer a number of amendments, but shall refrain, to carry into effect some suggestions made by competent naval men. In order, however, that the matter may be called to the attention of the Navy, and with the hope that some improvement may there be noted, I will briefly call attention to one or two of such suggestions.

It has been suggested that appropriations for the increase of the Navy shall be expended, as far as practicable, so as to make the vessels authorized in the 1916 naval program equal or superior to the best being provided by other nations, and in order to accomplish that result the suggestion is made that the Secretary of the Navy be required to appoint from officers in sea service on vessels of the most serviceable character special boards to investigate and recommend such changes as may be found necessary and practicable.

We know, Mr. President, that the men who serve with the submarines are better able to determine their serviceability and their efficiency than some who spend all their time on shore. In my opinion it would be for the advantage of the Navy if this suggestion were carried out and special boards were appointed to investigate and recommend such changes as may be found necessary and practicable, the boards to be appointed from persons who have had practical experience, each board to consist of three officers, one from each grade that operates the type of vessel before the board.

All officers appointed to such boards should have records of practical experience of at least two years' sea service on a vessel of the type before the board. Can anybody object to this suggestion?

The board should consist of members to be equally divided among the various classes of officers who operate a vessel of the type which is before the board for consideration and adoption. It is suggested that there be attached to each board one or two naval constructors and one or two engineering officers especially experienced in the designing and construction of the type of vessel which is before the board for adoption.

It is further suggested that civilian experts from plants constructing vessels of the type before the board shall be permitted to appear and submit their views and make suggestions and recommendations.

The suggestion is further made that the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, based upon investigations to be made, and when the reasons for such course are strong and convincing, be authorized to suspend construction upon some of the vessels authorized, making proper and exhaustive reports to Congress.

I shall not offer any amendment embodying these suggestions, but hope that they will receive due consideration at the hands of the naval authorities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for a roll call on the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks for the yeas and nays. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word in regard to my vote on the bill. I think perhaps this is the first instance in my service here in which I have felt disposed to say anything merely in explanation of my vote. I generally permit my vote to speak for itself.

Mr. President, I am going to vote for the passage of the bill, although I do so feeling very certain that it carries a much larger appropriation than is justified. I think the House bill itself carried a very large appropriation, ample, if not more than ample, for any provision which it is necessary to make at this time for the maintenance of the Navy. I feel, therefore, perfectly convinced that the items which have been added by the Senate can not be in reason or in justice to the taxpayers of the country sustained, and if the bill stood upon the question of appropriations I should unhesitatingly vote against it. But there has been added to the bill an amendment which covers a proposition in which I feel a very deep interest and concerning which I have a great hope, perhaps a greater hope than most of my colleagues. It is natural for one who has been peculiarly identified with a measure to expect more from it than those who have not been. If I felt that this amendment which I have offered, and which has been adopted, were clearly out of trouble, I should not feel so hesitant about voting against the bill.

I know, however, that there is still much opposition to the amendment, or to the cause, and I do not feel that I can cast my vote in a way which could be construed under any circumstances as a lack of faith in the amendment or as an impairment of what I consider to be its real worth and merit. I do not mean to say, when I intimate that there may be objections to the amendment, that they are in the Senate or that they will be upon the part of the conferees of the Senate, but there may possibly come objection from other sources. I want to be in a position where nothing will militate against the most extreme and determined measures to preserve this amendment just as it has been written into the bill. I prefer, therefore, and think it is my duty to vote for the bill, notwithstanding I believe the appropriations are too large. I believe the cause of disarmament the most vital issue in the cause of world peace and absorbed the cause of world peace and absorbed the cause of world peace and absorbed to the cause of world peace and absorbed to the cause of the c lutely necessary to relieve the people from economic ruin. Feeling thus, I so vote.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I feel that I am in somewhat the position of the Senator from Idaho, when he says he is usually content to let his vote speak for itself. If I voted for this bill, I would be voting for a large amount of new construction which my soul protests against at this time. If I vote against the bill, then I am voting against some items for the proper maintenance of a proper Navy, and that is regrettable. But I am compelled to vote either for or against the bill, and I propose to vote against it. At the same time, I want it understood, as I stated a moment ago, that I am in favor of a proper Navy at any and all times.

I recognize the value of the so-called Borah amendment. I think it is the best paragraph in the bill. If I could have my way, except for the matters of maintenance, I would strike out everything else in the bill except that paragraph. But I do not think my vote on the bill itself will be misconstrued when citizens have before them the Borah amendment and know what the Senate did regarding it. I remember that but two weeks ago there seemed to be an unalterable, irresistible opposition to the Borah amendment, and at last it vanished like mist before the morning sun, and there was not a Senator here who was willing to have his vote recorded against the Borah amendment.

It may be that it will do no good. I hope it will. I hope the President will take up the subject of disarmament at once and in earnest. I do not like to say anything which may seem to reflect upon any Member of the Senate, but when I have before me the record of this country upon the subject of disarmament, I can not help but think that at this moment, when we seek, as we do by this bill, to add $100,000,000 to the House bill, we are exercising bad faith not only toward the world but toward the American people.

In this day perhaps one ought not to refer to the treaty of Versailles, but I remember that for months and months it was discussed in the Senate, and I remember, too, that in the covenant for a league of nations was a declaration in favor of the reduction of armaments and a pledge by the signatory powers that some plan of disarmament should be devised. That scheme was approved by 42 nations, and in all of the discussion in the Senate, covering a period of months, there was not one word uttered, as I now recall, against that provision of the treaty. But ever since its discussion there has been a concerted effort here by a majority of the Senate, and I do not mean to say they are all on the other side of the Chamber, in favor of continued armament. Instead of disarmament, we are to have more armament, with the added burdens of taxation to our people.

The program of 1916, as I understand, was to cost a billion dollars. I may not be entirely accurate in this statement, but as I understand it, about $500,000,000 has already been expended upon that program, and because of the increased price of material and labor it is estimated that it will require $640,- 000,000 more to complete the program.

I wonder how we can go to the taxpayers of this country and say we are consistent, after our professions in favor of economy and in favor of disarmament, if we shall at this time add a hundred million dollars to the House bill and seek to carry out the original program of 1916, which was adopted in time of war. Maybe other Senators can reconcile themselves to that . position. I can not.

It seems to me there is only one course for me to pursue, and that is to make my protest at this time as earnest and as strong as I can make it against these added expenditures.

There is no Senator here who can say that there is no prospect of getting into an agreement. In my judgment, if the United States would take the first step, Great Britain and Japan, before the sun went down, would indorse our position and be glad to meet us at least halfway.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, in view of the fact that I part company with my friend the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah], I think it is proper that I should state my reasons.

When his amendment was first proposed, he knows I was one of its first friends, and he knows I stood ready to advocate it at any time when it seemed probable that my voice would add to its strength and assist its passage.

But, Mr. President, the consideration of this bill has gone on from day to day and from week to week, and almost without exception the efforts of those who tried to remember the interests of the common people, who have to foot the bill for this enormous navy, and whatever it may draw after it, have been voted down with a relentless regularity, and no effort whatever made by those who tried to speak for those people, interpreting their voice as rendered at the ballot box last November, could reach the majority in this Chamber.

Mr. President, who framed the bill which came over from the House? A lot of schoolboys? A lot of triflers? A lot of men with a pitchfork or a number of pitchforks, throwing a bill together hastily and without consideration? Mr. President, that bill was framed with as great a degree of care as could have attended the framing of the Senate bill. Sagacious men were at the head of the committee which framed it. The very party which speaks to us in one voice from the House of Representatives speaks to us with another voice from the Senate.

Did not Mr. Mondell, leader of the House, and those who worked with him seek expert advice? Did they not carefully weigh every need of this country? They say they did; the presumption is they did; we know that they did. They come here and say, "Give us $400,000,000 and we will be answerable on the frontier, whether upon the land or upon the deep."

Why should we not take their word, as well as the word of the leader of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate? From what source is our danger to come? What are we afraid of? Of whom are we afraid?

The names of Japan and Great Britain have been flung back and forth in this debate like red flags before the eyes of an infuriated bull. Everything calculated to irritate, to provoke, to have a dare come answering dare, has been used in this debate.

It is true I voted for the amendment relating to the Charleston Navy Yard. It gives the bill a more national character. It shows that the bill is not sectional. I stand by that vote, and will defend it before my people. Charleston is a point of the greatest strategic value in the case of any future war. I have waived the point that the port of Brunswick, in the State of Georgia, begged the committee, begged the Government, to deepen the bar 400 feet wide and to channel from the ocean to one of the finest harbors in the world. The Chief of Engineers, Mr. President, urgently recommended the consideration of that harbor. The demand was brought down to a request for $200,000 to complete a dredge to clean out that channel and throw the sifting sands aside. That request for two years has knocked at the national door, and it has been scorned.

I have no request in that regard. A later time will give me the opportunity to make it. But, if I may do so without offense, I again warn Senators that there are people at home who will speak again next year, and those who have to face those people next year had better remember what those people said last year.

A scant seven months has passed since the voice of the people was heard, and now, Mr. President, we find a forgetfulness of the distress of the people, with wheat selling below the cost of production; half the loaf stricken from the hand of the laboring man as he carries it to his mouth; the farmer abandoning his farm; mules worth $200 a year or so ago selling for $15 to $20; a bale of cotton not paying for the fertilizer which produced it, to say nothing of the labor, the support of the family, the support of the farm, the taxes, the interest on the money invested, a bale of cotton selling below the cost of the ton of fertilizer used in producing it.

And now we have the Comptroller of the Currency giving out an interview in the Washington Herald of last Thursday, in which he virtually said that hard times are good for the people. How much harder does he want them to get, in God's name? Hard times are good for the people, Mr. Crissinger virtually said in that interview. Have they been hard for him? Are they hard for officeholders generally? A man boosted to high office, drawing a big salary, with a staff of employees to wait upon him, does not hear the cry from the farm, the forge, the wheat field, the cotton field; from the machine shop, from the printing shop, and from every other field of industry.

Mr. President, I am willing to vote for the bill as it came from the House. Further than that I can not conscientiously go, and I must vote against it although I seem to vote against the amendment of my friend the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah]. I wish I could put as much confidence in what is going to be done under that amendment as he seems to. I am not so sure but that we are playing a game of diplomacy in this matter and that the amendment, upon which the House of Representatives has not acted, will turn to ashes upon his lips.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have heretofore stated that if the additional $100,000,000, or any considerable part of it, were added to the bill as passed by the House, I should vote against the bill, and I propose to do so.

I can not look upon the financial situation of the United States with any degree of equanimity. I can not look upon the reckless extravagance of this Congress with any degree of patience. You, the dominant party in the Congress, made a promise to the people for economy. Perhaps you received more votes at the last election arising out of the discontent of the people of the United States because of the serious burden of taxes than from any other single cause. To some extent the taxes of which the people then complained were necessary. They grew out of the war. There is not, however, three years after the war any excuse in my opinion for the reckless purpose of Congress to continue and even to increase this tremendous burden upon the American people.

Why not go back to the period before the war, when we appropriated $100,000,000 for the Army and $123,000,000 for the Navy? Why not make an effort to go back, as people in their private life and in their business enterprises are now making to get back to normal conditions? Instead of that you propose an appropriation for the Army of $336,000,000, as against $100,000,000 before the war. You propose an appropriation for the Navy of $500,000,000, as against $120,000,000 before the war. You propose aggregate taxes levied by this Congress upon the American people approximating $4,500,000,000, as against something like $600,000,000 or $700,000,000 before the war.

Must Congress, charged with the responsibility to the American people, go on thus recklessly in these after-the-war days without any effort to come back to the normal? I warn you, Senators, that we have a different condition from what we had immediately following the war. When business was buoyant, when men were employed, when wages were high, when profits were large, it was comparatively easy then to levy high taxes upon the American people. But you are confronted by a different situation to-day, and you will be confronted by a different situation for some time if this method of procedure continues.

Business is depressed. In many lines profits are wiped out. Agriculture is practically prostrate because the farmers, North and South, and in the West particularly, are being compelled to sell the products of their soil and of their toil at less than it cost to produce them, and they have little prospect of better prices. Manufacturing institutions are running on one-third time, and millions of men are out of work. The copper mines of the country, that produce great surplus supplies of copper to sell to the rest of the world, are closed and hundreds of thousands of their employees have nothing to do. The railroads that you have sought by taxing the American people to put into a prosperous or semiprosperous condition are on the ragged edge of bankruptcy with their business to-day.

Our commerce, our export trade, is falling off at the rate of $100,000,000 a month, as compared with a year ago. Our imports are falling off at about the same rate. International commerce, that makes a nation great and powerful and rich, is undergoing a tremendous decline. The banks of the country have staggered through a period of stress and storm at the expense of their customers by denying them needed credit. Now, in the face of all this, you propose to levy upon the American people taxes exceeding $4,000,000,000, and a large part of it in preparing for a war that you know is not to come.

Our country now has a debt twenty-four times as large as it had five years ago. The interest upon that debt costs the American people as much as the whole appropriations of Congress amounted to before the war. In addition to that, we have hanging over the country a floating debt of $2,000,000,000, and the Treasury Department does not know what to do with it. It can not be paid off. It can hardly be funded, because to borrow the money on bonds issued by the Government would probably involve paying 5½ per cent interest, and that will still more depreciate the value of the Liberty bonds outstanding. The Government to-day is borrowing money at 5½ per cent interest.

A few days ago we noticed in the press that the British treasury had notified the administrative offices of the British Government that they must in the coming year reduce their expenditures 20 per cent. Why? Because the British Government felt that it had reached the limit and could not levy another penny upon the British people, and it had to pay to the Government of the United States $230,000,000 a year beginning January 1 for interest on its debt. Why can not our Government take some such example as is set by the British Government and reduce the expenses and the costs of government?

Mr. President, I realize that Congress is not the only offender. When I spoke a few days ago I referred to my own State and the extravagance, the wicked, wasteful extravagance, of the legislature that has just adjourned there. Since that time I have sent out to get the actual figures, and they illustrate what State legislatures of the United States are doing following the lead of the Congress of the United States. Let me read the figures, and I shall then ask to put them in the Record in tabulated form.

The legislature just adjourned in Nebraska appropriated for the next two years $30,091,333; two years ago the appropriation was $20,031,757; two years before that it was $9,694,181. So it runs back, blennium by blennium, to 1907, when it was only $4,367,000. What has been going on in Nebraska is the same thing that has been going on here, the swelling year by year of appropriations for pieces of extravagance at the expense of the taxpayers.

I say to you, Senators, that there is an issue growing in the land to which people who operate the Government will have to pay some attention. The people of the United States, regardless of whether they want disarmament or preparation for war, object to having the Government transposed into a devouring monster to eat up the subsistence of the people. You have a people for whom you are legislating now who are going to have a hard enough time during the next two years in any event. As a further protest against the extravagance represented in the pending bill and represented in other bills I am going to vote against the bill, not because I do not want a reasonable Navy but because to vote against it is the only way for a Senator to make emphatic the protest that he feels in his heart against the extravagance.

I ask to have inserted in the Record the tabulated statement to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Legislative appropriations-Nebraska.

Session.	Total appropriations.	Amount raised by direct taxation.	Amount raised by fees and other sources, not direct.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move that the bill under consideration be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs with instructions that there shall be deducted from the general total $200,000,000

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry. I understand the measure has reached the point of a vote upon its final passage. A yea-and-nay vote was demanded and ordered, but before that name was called this discussion occurred. I depth if it is a proper time to move its recommitment.

doubt if it is a proper time to move its recommitment.

Mr. KING. My brief examination of the authorities, in view of the status of the bill in its process of going to final passage, led me to the conclusion that the motion is in order. The question of the final passage of the bill had been suggested, and, as I recall, one Senator had asked for the yeas and nays. Pending that some one secured the floor. My understanding was that not until the roll has been proceeded with would the motion be not in order, but in the present status it is in order.

not in order, but in the present status it is in order.

Mr. LENROOT. I may call the Chair's attention to Rule XXII, which clearly makes a motion to recommit in order at any time while a question is pending prior to the roll call.

Utah to recommit the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I do not believe that the world will ever have such an opportunity again to do something of a substantial nature for the future peace of the world. I believe that if the time is ever to come when some big nation should take the lead, not merely in talking about the future peace of the world but in doing something that looks toward its accomplishment, that time is now.

The old world is in the throes of a very distressing financial condition. Millions of her young men have been murdered and millions more are crippled and unable to do much work in the way of supporting themselves.

I repeat what I said here on a former occasion, more than half the wealth of the habitable globe has been expended in four years' time in a war, the most cruel and brutal that ever cursed the world. And yet here we are in the aftermath of that war, when the allied nations owe us $10,000,000,000, when the public debt piled upon the backs of the American people runs into the billions, when depressing conditions are prostrating the agricultural sections of the West and the South, when factories are closing down, mines are put out of commission, and 2,000,000 men are walking the streets begging for work to obtain bread and meat for themselves and families, adding to the House naval bill of $400,000,000 the sum of $100,000,000 more.

Senators, why are we doing that? When the war was raging and the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy called upon Congress to put the Navy in order, we opened the public Treasury and expended millions and even hundreds of millions of dollars; we built the best Navy in the world in some respects, and to-day it is second only to that of Great Britain in size and an improvement over hers in many particulars. We are ready now to defend our interests under any emergency that may arise, and yet we are adding to the House bill for naval purposes $100,000,000 more. Why are we doing it, I ask again? Mr. President, I want to keep faith with the boys who sleep in France; I want to keep faith with the 4,000,000 who put on the uniform of our country, 2,000,000 of whom went to France, and the others were here at home in training camps ready to go.

We told them that their sacrifice was to put down war and to prevent the recurrence of any other such war. We told those boys, when they were on the firing line, giving up their lives and shedding their blood, that we were going to begin a world movement for disarmament and would commence at once a campaign for a world-wide reduction in armament, and yet here we are breaking faith with the living and the dead who fought in that war and breaking faith with the American fathers and mothers who gave their sons and their substance to win that war.

What are we doing to promote peace in the world? We have adopted an amendment calling Great Britain and Japan to join with us in discussing the matter of cutting down armaments; and yet in the very bill which carries that amendment we are piling up millions of dollars to build more armament.

I call upon this body to keep faith with the living and the dead; I call upon this body to have respect for those whose purse strings were unloosed to provide the enormous amount of money needed for conducting the war to a successful conclusion. I call on you to give some consideration to the overburdened taxpayers of America who have got to pay the public debt.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], in one of the hearings the other day, when something was said about reducing taxes, expressed the opinion that Federal taxes would be increased. That is not what Senators on the other side said on the hustings in the campaign last fall. They said they were going to reduce taxes; that they were going to cut down expenses; but here they are increasing taxes and increasing expenditures without any good reason or public necessity for doing so.

Who do the Senators think will believe that we are in danger of being attacked by any foreign nation within the next five years? Think of it. In a time like this $100,000,000 added to the House naval bill. Senators, you will not be able to convince the taxpayers nor the boys who have worn the uniform; you will not be able to convince anybody except those who are going to profit financially by the expenditure of the American taxpayers' money. In what way are we justified in taking such a step at this time?

Why not stop for a little while and say to the world, "We are not expending a dollar for additional armament. We have only got what we were compelled to build in order to put down the enemy of mankind. We want to prevent the recurrence of another such war, and in order that there may be a beginning in the matter we propose to lead in the movement. We are not going to do anything in naval construction this year. If you want to go into this world peace arrangement with us, if you are really in earnest, follow our example. If you do not, after we discontinue our program for a year, should you drive us to the building of more armament, and we see that we have got it to do as a matter of self-defense, we will do it."

Now is the time for the biggest Nation on the globe, the richest Nation in the world to take the lead in the matter of reducing the size of national armament.

Mr. President, I favor the provisions in the pending bill that care for the upkeep of the Navy; I am in favor of the provisions that take care of the running expenses of the Navy; I voted for those provisions when the bill was before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. I am in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], which provides for a step toward reduction in armament, but it does not go far enough.

But I can not vote for the whole bill as now presented without indorsing the unjust and unnecessary provisions that carry a hundred million dollars of unwarranted appropriations. I want my Government to set the example and lead the nations out of the quagmire of the wilderness, where evil propagandists hatch out big armaments in the hotbed and breeding place of the Senator from Utah [Mr. King].

Mr. KING. I desire to perfect my motion and, with the permission of the Chair, I will restate it. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs with instructions to report it back with a reduction of $100,000,000. That would cut down the amount proposed to be carried in the bill substantially to the sum appropriated by the bill as it came from the other House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes have it.

Mr. KING. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Ball], who is absent. I understand, however, that if present he would vote as I intend to vote on this question. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Caraway], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER], and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLean], who is absent. Being unable to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HEFLIN (when Mr. Robinson's name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson's name was called). sire to announce that the Senator from Making son] is absent on account of serious illness in his family.

Making

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). the same announcement as on the previous vote with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). have a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen]. I understand, however, that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. I, accordingly, feel at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). nounce my pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). First transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Peneose], who is unfortunately not present, to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Ransdell], I vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Watson], who is not in the Chamber. I am therefore not at liberty to vote, and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FERNALD. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Jones] to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce that my colleague is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. REED. On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Brandegee], but I understand that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Caraway] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Edge] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Owen], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. New] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Shields].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 43, as follows: YEAS—25.

So the Senate refused to recommit the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been requested and ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. Johnson's name was called). have been requested to announce the absence of the Senator from California and to say that if he were present he would vote " yea.'

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Caraway]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. Johnson] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLean], who is absent, but on this question I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when Mr. OVERMAN'S name was called). wish to announce again the unavoidable absence from the city of my colleague [Mr. Overman]. If he were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea." He is, however, paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call—that is, that I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Brandegee], who, I understand, would vote as I shall vote-I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with respect to my pair. I vote "yea.'

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made by me concerning my pair on the previous roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). As I have announced, I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Overman], but on the assurance of his colleague that he would vote as I shall vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Warson]. I am advised that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote, and I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have a pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Colt]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. Culberson] and will vote. vote "nav.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have a pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Reed], but he has voted, and I therefore vote

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Edge] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. New] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS 1.

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 17, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. Poindexter, Mr. Hale, and Mr. Swanson conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONFIRMATION OF ENSIGNS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have just received a statement from the Navy Department, which was delayed in reaching the appointment officer of the Bureau of Navigation, that Midshipmen Faine, Meredith, Brandt, Farrell, Hyatt, and Thompson have successfully completed the course at the Naval Academy and will graduate on the 2d of June with the rest of The Secretary of the Navy, it is stated, would their class. appreciate it if the nominations of these midshipmen with the rank of ensign could be confirmed to-day, so that their commissions as ensigns may be handed to them along with those of their classmates to-morrow, immediately after graduation. It would be quite an unfortunate thing for these young men if they did not receive their commissions along with the rest of their

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if we could not, in executive session-

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was going to ask unanimous consent to consider the nominations as in executive session.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be done in open session if there is no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I was interrupted, and I did not hear the request.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The request was for unanimous consent to act upon the nominations sent in by the President of six midshipmen whose names have been omitted from the list, and who have graduated with their class, and who should receive their commissions with the rest of the class.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me— of course I approve of it and I shall vote for it; there will be no objection, I know; but I think it is better to do executive business in executive session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was going to ask whether the nominations had gone to the calendar.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; they have not gone to the calendar. There is somewhat of an emergency.

Mr. LODGE. It is necessary to act on them because they graduate to-morrow.

Mr. POINDEXTER. They graduate to-morrow, and it was for that reason that I brought up the matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, as the Senator knows, I have raised objections to the confirmation of nominations until they first appear on the calendar, so that notice may be given. But in a case of this kind, where their commissions will go to them as a matter of course, as they are graduated and there can be no question about their confirmation, I think it is an exception to the rule, and I have no objection,

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent, as in open executive session, that the nominations be confirmed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the names.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Buell F. Brandt, Leo B. Farrell, Elisha E. Meredith, Cecil Faine, Delwyn Hyatt, Julius L. Thompson.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Does the Senate advise and consent to the appointments? [Putting the question.] The Secate advises and consents.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that the President be notified. The VICE PRESIDENT. The President will be notified.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6300, the second deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if he proposes going further to-day than the formal reading of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. After the bill is taken up, I shall answer the Senator's question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6300, the second deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6300) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill first be read for amendments, the amendments of the committee to be first acted upon. I will say to the Senator from Utah that if any amendments come up in the early consideration of the bill which he or others wish to have laid aside until a later time, I shall not

I wish the Senator would, after the formal reading, let the bill go over until to-morrow, so that we may have a chance to examine it. Many of us have not had an opportunity to even read it, as it has just been printed and placed upon the desks of Senators. I understand there are provisions in the bill not for deficits, although the bill is denominated a "deficiency bill." The bill, as I understand, projects itself into next year, and carries appropriations which, if proper, should have been in the regular appropriation bills heretofore submitted and acted upon.

Mr. WARREN. I have said to the Senator that such amendments will be laid over until to-morrow if he or any other Senator objects. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the Senate committee amendments be first considered

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be read for action on committee amendments.

Mr. KING. Do I understand the position of the Senator from Wyoming to be that the Senate amendments will be disposed of before other amendments are considered?

Mr. WARREN. Senate amendments will be disposed of first, in the usual way, and then the bill will be open to amendment offered by any Senator.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, after line 14, to insert the following:

BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY.

To enable the Bureau of Efficiency to perform the duties imposed upon it by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921, $10,000.

Mr. KING. I ask that that may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the amendment will be passed over temporarily.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 2, after line 23, under the heading "Civil Service Commission," to insert:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to transfer, without payment therefor, to the Civil Service Commission one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle.

Mr. KING. I ask that that may go over.
The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the amendment will be passed over temporarily.

The next amendment was, on page 3, to strike out lines 18 to 22, inclusive, as follows:

Rent Commission: For an additional amount for salaries and expenses authorized by section 103, Title II, of "The food control and the District of Columbia rents act," approved October 22, 1919, $15,000, to centinue available during the life of the commission.

Mr. KING. I ask that that may go over.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say at this point that some of these items which are stricken out are merely stricken out at this point and reinserted later in the bill under a section which has reference to the 1922 appropriations. So that may be passed over and the subject matter may be agreed to when reached again in the latter part of the bill. I think the subject matter should be agreed to when we taken it up later on, but that the committee amendment at this point should be agreed to now. Mr. KING. With that understanding, I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The objection is withdrawn, and the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 25, page 5, the end of the items under the heading "Public schools.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to ask the chairman of the committee, and perhaps more properly the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Curtis], a question in regard to this. I understood there was to be a provision, which may appear in the bill later on, because I have not read the bill, to take care of the school situation here, touching the school buildings and grounds.

Mr. WARREN. There is a line of amendments for school buildings, grounds, and so forth, amounting to more than a million and a half dollars, which is inserted in the bill later on, on page 76.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 7, under the item, "Fire department, for contingent expenses," etc., to strike out "$2,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 8, under the item "For fuel, fire department," to strike out "$2,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,000."

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether these are augmentations of former appropriations?

Mr. WARREN. In the regular appropriation bill we appropriated what we thought was sufficient for fuel, but the increases in prices for fuel have exhausted the funds and left the authorities without the money to pay for coal the balance of the year. It is the usual deficiency. It is authorized under the law, and it is common in these particular cases.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Wyoming if there has not been heretofore a deficiency bill which was presumed to care for this particular item?

Mr. WARREN. There has not been. We had a first deficiency bill, which the Senator probably noticed was very small, and pertained mainly to the conduct of the House and Senate, for mileage, for employees, and so forth. Perhaps the Senator has in mind the regular bill for 1922, which was passed in the winter.

Mr. KING. Yes; I had that in mind. Mr. WARREN. That is not applicable until after the 1st day of July, and this is to bring these matters up to the 1st of July. Mr. SMOOT. This is a real deficiency.

Mr. WARREN. It is a real deficiency which has been incurred. Perhaps every dollar of the appropriations will be exhausted by the end of the present month.

Mr. KING. As I understand, though, there are items in this bill which are anticipatory; that is to say, appropriations have been made for the next fiscal year, and it is now determined by some officials of the departments that those appropriations were not adequate, and they are asking for deficiencies or enlarged appropriations now.

Mr. WARREN. I think I ought to say to the Senator at this point that the history of these estimates is something like this:

After a very severe cutting of appropriations, and the assembling of this Congress in this session, the first 14 days produced upward of $230,000,000 in estimates; for which we were requested to appropriate. The flood was so large that I felt it necessary, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, to call the attention of the President to it, and the President either had already or did then call the attention of the heads of the departments to the matter, and there has been a gradual drying up, if I may use that term, of the estimates since that time, so that the estimates probably do not reach far above $250,000,000.

In the meantime the House sent us this bill covering a trifle over $100,000,000. Intermingled in the bill were various items for 1922. The Appropriations Committee of the Senate saw fit to separate the items, so that the Senate might at a glance know exactly what was done and could take such course as they saw fit as to these two branches of the bill. So that all the items in the first part of this bill, up to about page 75, are genuine deficiencies, and, so far as I know, are deficiencies under the law, because the law prescribes that the President and the Cabinet officers may exercise their judgment in authorizing deficiencies to save life or property, or to meet emergencies and laws of various kinds.

The amount in the bill as it came to us was something over $75,000,000 of genuine deficiencies and something over $24,000,-000 for things we could consider as necessary appropriations for the year commencing July 1, 1921. The Senate committee has acted upon both the 1921 and 1922 items, in approval or disapproval. We have added some $53,000,000 to what the House appropriated, $50,000,000 of which is one item which is added to the appropriations for shipping.

On the other hand, the items cut out do not appear here, because we have to put in on the Senate side judgments and audited claims, which amount to some millions of dollars. It is always our duty to include those, and the better time to include them is in the last deficiency bill of the fiscal year.

That is the history of the appropriations in this bill as they will appear, and the Senator, if he wishes to devote his attention strictly or largely to those appropriations for 1922, will find them from page 74 of the print to the end of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word, and what I say now is more properly addressed to the Senate when we come to consider the new items to which the Senator has referred, and I use the expression "new items" in contradistinction to deficiency items.

I can not yet understand the reason for not including those items in the appropriation bills which we have heretofore passed and which were presumed to meet the requirements of the Government for the next fiscal year. If it has already been discovered before we enter upon the next fiscal year that appropriations were not sufficiently large or were not adequate we could deal with that question before the expiration of the year and before deficiencies have been created. It looks to me as if it were an invitation for departments which have received appropriations in the last bills to exceed those appropriations and to incur deficits or to lay foundations for appeals to Congress for additional appropriations.

Of course I would not suggest to the distinguished chairman of the committee, because I know his honor and his rectitude, that when he reported the appropriation bills for the next fiscal year he subtracted from them, or rather failed to include therein, items which were legitimate and should have been added, in order to give the appearance of economy, with the expectation of subsequently submitting supplemental bills or asking for deficiency appropriations. Of course, it is possible that additional information has come to the Committee on Appropriations since those bills were reported and passed, which would warrant even at this premature period an increase in the amounts heretofore appropriated, but I submit that it would have been better, as I now see the case, to have waited until next year to see how far the appropriations made would legitimately and properly meet the expenses of the various departments.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the distinguished Senator from Utah, whose remarks I value because his ideas on this particular question are not so far from my own, that there are various reasons, and they will be stated as debate occurs upon the different subjects. For instance, we have the public debt, that we have previously provided for by large appropriations in bulk. They have out of that lump sum paid certain salaries and employed certain men, and expenses have been taken care of in that way. In the meantime, when it comes to the 1st day of July, that provision will no longer be effective and it must be considered differently if we wish to carry out the plan that we have had before us for some years to do away, as far as possible, with lump-sum appropriations and to get the employees of the Government on the rolls and reclassified in order that, to some extent, they may know their duties and perform them economically and efficiently. Hence, in that matter there will appear what will seem, until explained, to be the employment of more men and the payment of additional salaries in the Treasury Department; but the provision simply means they are transferred from one fund to another.

We come to another department of the Treasury, the office of the comptroller. I wish to say with reference to that office. and if I am wrong in what I say I wish to be corrected before we finish with the bill—and I feel sure that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass], ex-Sécretary of the Treasury, will make any correction necessary-that during the occupancy of that office by Mr. John Skelton Williams I do not recall that we increased by one dollar the appropriations as they were at the commencement of his term of office for any department. We allowed him no more employees. We did not increase the salaries there as we did in other departments.

When the present comptroller takes charge of the office he takes it with a line of employees that have been detailed to him from other departments. In those other departments we have cut them down by the hundreds and even by the thousands, and these employees go out on the 1st day of July, if not before. In that one bureau 56 men go out on the 1st day of July. Hence we could not very well wait in a case like that until we get into the next year to learn the necessities, because the necessities are right here staring us in the face. Therefore we must provide for them, not putting it under the heading of a deficiency, but, as this committee has done, putting it under the head of emergencies, if you please, so that we may consider each one on its merits.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator a question? Of course a deficiency bill is supposed to take care of deficiencies. May I ask the distinguished Senator from Wyoming if there is any appropriation in the pending deficiency bill to pay the salaries of offices that have been created by law recently, which is not for a deficiency, but to provide for some appropriation for the year 1922?

Mr. WARREN. How am I to understand the Senator from Mississippi about that?

Mr. HARRISON. I understand a deficiency bill is to take care of deficiencies that exist. Is there any part of the approprintion carried in the pending deficiency bill to provide for the salary of some office that has been recently created by law and which is not a deficiency, but is an appropriation for salaries for the fiscal year 1922?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator, yes. It is in fact a deficiency if a day or two before we may adjourn a session of Congress in which we are to appropriate for certain salaries we create an office and provide a salary but do not pay it. Until that salary is paid it is a deficiency.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not understand the Senator to mean that an appropriation is to be carried in the bill for the salary of some officer from July 1, 1921, to July 1, 1922. Is that to be carried in the bill? Is that a deficiency?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no. I supposed the Senator had reference to a particular case. If he would name the individuals he has in mind I could meet his question. Perhaps the Senator may mean the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. The Assistant Secretary of War, under the law, is now drawing $10,000 a year. Under the provisions of the legislative and judicial appropriation bill the House provided $5,000 and the Senate increased it to $10,000. The Senate in conference on that bill had to leave the amount appropriated for salary $5,000. In the pending bill we are undertaking to provide that after the 1st of July the salary shall be $10,000, for that is what it is entitled to be under the law.

Mr. HARRISON. Then in this bill there are appropriations carried to pay the salaries of men for the fiscal year 1922 which are not now a deficiency.

Mr. WARREN. I know of nothing of that kind in the first section of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not?

Mr. HARRISON. Ine Selator does not?

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, all the appropriations that are carried in this bill are for genuine deficiencies?

Mr. WARREN. Those that are carried in the first section of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not confining my suggestion to any one section of the bill. I am confining it to the whole bill. Are there any appropriations carried in this deficiency bill for salaries for the fiscal year 1922 which are not classed as a deficiency?

Mr. WARREN. There are.

Mr. HARRISON. In what amount? Mr. WARREN. We will approach them from time to time, as they are in each case carried under a heading that shows exactly what they are and that they will continue for 1922.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask why—— Mr. WARREN. Just let me finish, please. In the first place, if the bill passed Congress too late to provide for it in another session, then we ought to take care of it here before the 1st of July, of course. On the other hand, in the case I have just mentioned, where a lump sum was appropriated in connection with the public debt, employing a large line of employees, if legislation heretofore adopted provides that it shall cease in the form in which it has been carried on heretofore and up to the 1st of July, we have to provide for taking over the necessary employees, and that has been done in this bill, as the Senator will observe.

Mr. HARRISON. Is that not exceptional? Is that following the general practice of the Congress in providing for salaries of employees that are not deficiencies?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that when he talks about ordinary times he must remember that we have extraordinary times now and have had for a number of years, since at least the commencement of the war. During the war Senators on both sides of the Chamber, as well as Members of the House, were standing strictly by the Com-mander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the President of the United States, and these matters came to the Committee on Appropriations as deficiencies ad libitum, as something necessary, and immediately necessary, and we passed upon them as Undoubtedly that has brought about the habit of depending more or less upon getting into deficiency appropriation bills those things which ought to wait for the regular appropriation bills, and for that reason the committee has undertaken as nearly as it can to separate and, furthermore, to clean up that situation so that deficiency bills may again get back to the basis of the deficiency bills of years ago, when they provided strictly only for what was short under the appropriations that we made and was called for by the proper authorities.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that when we reach the emergency appropriations if there is any question arises in the Senator's mind as to why those items should be in this bill the members of the committee will gladly state to the Senate the reasons why they are thus incorporated.

I will say to the Senator that, for instance, on page 90 is an item involving the Department of the Interior. That is a case exactly such as was referred to by the Senator from Mis-Ordinarily it should not be in a deficiency approsissippi. priation bill, and we have not put it in the bill as a deficiency, but we have put it in as an emergency, and this is the reason why. There may be other reasons for all the others, but in this particular case we have added $65,600. The reason for that is that we passed the oil leasing bill a short time ago, and that has thrown upon the Department of the Interior an immense amount of additional work. Since the passage of that bill we have collected nearly $9,000,000 of royalties. We have not given the Interior Department a single, solitary extra employee because of that law. Applications for leases have piled up in the Interior Department, and the people who are making applications for leases to go on and prospect for oil have been waiting months in and months out, and unless we give the department new employees to make examination of the leases and get them into form and have them executed the Government of the United States will be in a position to say and will be compelled to say to all those applicants for permits to prospect for oil and gas and phosphate and all the minerals named in the bill, "We can not pass upon your lease, nor can you get it until we can take the leases up in their regular order, and it may be months before that can be done."

Mr. HARRISON. What I am trying to get at is whether or not there are any new offices recently created by law that are provided for in the bill for 1922 that should not be classed as deficiency appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that this is one of them.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason for that-

Mr. HARRISON. What is the amount which is appropriated in the pending bill for salaries for new offices during the year 1922?

Mr. SMOOT. The amount is very small, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. But it will total probably $100,000?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; a little over that,

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield to me?
Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. It may be said that there will be separated from the service on the 1st day of July, under bills which have previously passed Congress, hundreds-yes, thousands-of employees; but in some cases, as has been well explained by those who are responsible in the other House for the failure to appropriate for them, it has been found necessary to provide for a few of them under the provisions of this bill. If the Senator from Mississippi had been observant of the progress of the pending bill through the other House, he would have found that the head of the subcommittee there, Representative Wood, who had charge of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, said that in framing the bill and in contesting with conferees against their wish not to cut so closely, he had stated that he was of the opinion that it was better to cut severely and to let the departments figure on how many employees they could dispose of before the last month of the year came; and then, if there were any instances in which it could be shown that a department was short of men, as in the case of which the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] has just spoken, they should be taken care of in the deficiency bill or in some other bill. The other House has seen fit to add these provisions to this deficiency bill as it has come to us.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to hear the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations putting the blame on the other House for providing in a deficiency appropriation bill for the salaries of additional employees of the Federal Government for the year 1922.

Mr. WARREN. I can not allow the Senator from Mississippi to put me in the position of blaming the other House. I am simply stating the facts. We are under our rules not supposed to criticize the other House.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that. The Senator from Wyoming, then, does not blame the other House for creating under the bill additional places for employees, which will impose a burden of $97,000 upon the people of the country in additional taxes. However, what I am curious to know is whether or not the Appropriations Committee of the Senate has added to the appropriations as proposed by the bill as it came from the other House for the pay of additional employees whose places have been created by law. Has there been any addition made to the appropriations for that purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. None of which I am aware, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. None at all?

Mr. SMOOT. I hardly think the statement of the Senator from Mississippi in reference to the extra employees involving an additional expenditure upon the Government of $97,000 is fair.

Mr. HARRISON. I asked were there any additional employees:

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if the offices which are created in this bill did not bring to the Government of the United States many times over the amount the Government pays the employees they would not be provided for in the bill. I think the Senator will bear me out in saying that I am not in the habit of voting money to increase the number of employees in the Government service.

Mr. HARRISON. I know that nobody will charge the Senator with that, although I see in the bill that provision is made for a public building at Salt Lake City, Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. In behalf of that item I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that all he has got to do is to object to it, and it will go out.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not objected to it.

Mr. SMOOT. But when the Senator from Mississippi understands the reason why provision for that building is made in the bill I am sure he will not object to it.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sure the Senator from Utah has good reason for it and persuaded the committee that the provision was just and right.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as I am concerned, the item may go out. Mr. HARRISON. But I desire to ask the Senator from Utah, who is a Senator of long experience in this body and a legislator of great ability and powerful influence, has he ever before observed salaries provided for employees for years that are to come, as they are provided for in the pending bill, and then for such appropriations to be classed as deficiencies?

Mr. SMOOT. I have observed that many times, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand the Senator states that that has been the practice in the past; but may I ask the Senator from Utah, as an experienced legislator and a wise Senator, if he does not think that that practice ought to stop?

Mr. SMOOT. Except in cases where such action is not only absolutely an advantage to the people of the country but for the benefit of the Treasury of the United States, I would oppose the practice of appropriating money for a coming fiscal year in a deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Wyoming if they agree that the expression I shall now read and which is contained in the address of the present President of the United States was a wise utterance? Said President Harding:

At this point let me say that too much stress can not be laid on the fact that eternal vigilance is the price of economy and efficiency. Nothing is easier in a Government establishment than to continue in existence offices, positions, employments, once created. It requires persistence, determined stony-hearted devotion to the public interest. There must be sacrifice of the interests of the place holder, whose only reason for keeping his position is that he wants the salary.

Do the Senators agree with that sentiment? Mr. WARREN. Is the Senator from Mississippi addressing

Mr. HARRISON. I am addressing both of the Senators. Mr. WARREN. I do not like that method of procedure.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say I addressed my inquiry to both the distinguished Senator from Wyoming and the distinguished Senator from Utah.

Mr. WARREN. I should first like to answer the question how many employees have we added to those which are provided for in the pending bill by the other House? There only two instances in this bill, and no more, if I understand the bill-and I think I do-in which the Senate committee proposed to increase the number of employees which were provided by the other House; but in no case have we gone beyond the estimates. One instance is in connection with the Land Office, to cover the purpose which the Senator from Utah has well explained.

We have also provided for certain employees who are needed in the comptroller's office, as to whom a part of the explanation is that 56 employees have to go out because of the reduction in the number of employees which we have heretofore made in the several departments. I think, however, it would be preferableand I think the Senator would agree with me-when we come to items such as the last one to take up each item by itself, as we have the evidence at hand to show why the particular item was inserted.

As to the matter of struggling against deficiencies, the Appropriations Committee has always endeavored to prevent them. During the World War the Appropriations Committee, as the Senator knows, was oftentimes compelled to act with haste, and we may have become to some extent looser than we ought to be; but there have been always extreme cases which made it necessary to insert in deficiency bills items for the next fiscal year. Now, in the line of reform, if that is what the Senator is pointing out-

Mr. HARRISON. No; I am not a reformer, I will say to the Senator from Wyoming. I merely like, when men say they are going to cut down offices and save expense and cut down taxes to the people, to see them keep faith; but it seems that in this bill there is an additional burden of $97,000 imposed because of appropriations for additional offices, carried in the form of deficiencies, although they are not deficiencies, but are provided for the next fiscal year.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator read the bill? Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I have read it hurriedly; it was only reported on the 31st of May.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator read the bills heretofore passed in which thousands of employees were eliminated? Has he read the evidence that came before the Committee on Appro-

Mr. HARRISON. When was it printed? I can not read it until it is printed and handed to us.

Mr. WARREN. The evidence was printed some weeks ago, and the Senator could read the proceedings from day to day in the House when the pending bill was being considered there.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not on that committee, and I will never be on the committee, because they will not put me on the committee; they do not think I am good enough, perhaps, to be on that committee, and I can not get a copy of the hearings until it is printed. I notice that this bill was reported only on the 31st of May, and there is no way of reading it until it is reported and is printed. I am merely making inquiry of the distinguished Senators who are familiar with the facts, so that I may ascertain just what it is proposed to do.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator thinks we are familiar with the facts?

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator is familiar with them. Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that I would rather take these matters up item by item as we go along.

Mr. HARRISON. I am trying to elicit the views of the

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I would suggest to the Senator that there is no difficulty or secrecy about the hearings.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not say they were secret.

Mr. LODGE. I asked a page to get me a copy, and he obtained it for me in about a minute.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not say there was anything secret about them; they are not like the executive sessions of the Senate. I wish the executive sessions of the Senate were as open as the sessions of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield. Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will allow me, a very hasty recapitulation of the bill from page 82 to the end of the bill indicates that there is added for new officers and employees a total of something like $326,486, instead of $97,000.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Tennessee is entirely mistaken, as will be shown later.

Mr. HARRISON. I was mistaken in putting it at one-third of what it should have been. Now, I ask the Senator from propounded a moment ago, which was, if I understood it aright, Wyoming this question: In connection with the creation of new offices is not an appropriation of $6,000 provided in this bill for commissioner of public debt for the year 1922?

Mr. WARREN. The same official has been employed heretofore and has been paid the same amount under a lump sum, as I have stated to the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. But the appropriation carried in this bill is for the year 1922.

Mr. WARREN. That is very true; but the salary is provided for up to the first of the year from a lump-sum appropriation, as is indicated by the bill itself.

Mr. HARRISON. The first of what year?

Mr. WARREN. The first of the coming fiscal year.

Mr. HARRISON. The 1st of July?

Mr. WARREN. Yes. Mr. HARRISON. So we are providing for a salary of $6,000 for the commissioner of public debt from the 1st of July, 1921, to the 1st of July, 1922, which is not a deficiency-in fact, no deficiency exists.

Mr. WARREN. I have stated several times that there are matters of that kind included in the bill, but they do not involve the creation of new offices or any additional expense.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator about the commissioner of accounts and deposits?

Mr. WARREN. The same statement applies as to that officer. Mr. HARRISON. The sum of $6,000 is provided for that official. I understand the Senator to say that the same explanation applies in that case?

Mr. WARREN. Exactly the same. Mr. HARRISON. The appropriation is for his salary from the 1st of July, 1921, to the 1st of July, 1922? Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Has it ever been carried in a deficiency bill heretofore before a deficiency was created?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator ought not to ask a question like that.

Mr. HARRISON. Why not? I never can find out unless I

Mr. WARREN. When we appropriate a million dollars in a lump sum to carry on a certain work there is no necessity to appropriate an additional sum to provide for it; nor is there a deficiency asked for; but when it comes to the time when the lump-sum appropriation is exhausted, inasmuch as we have repealed the law under which salaries could be provided from the lump-sum appropriation and employees could be paid, we have included these employees in stated places and at stated salaries, and they are retained in the service at the same rate as heretofore. There is one salary here—and I wish to inform the Senator of it, so that he may make the most of it

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to make the most of it.

Mr. WARREN. I refer to undersecretary for the Treasury. I may say that he takes the place of other employees, and the change is in the line of economy. A similar provision was placed in the bill in the House, but it went out on a point of order. We have reinstated that item.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to ask about other offices provided for in the bill. There is a commissioner of accounts and deposits at $6,000. The same proposition is involved in that case, I presume. Then there is the division of deposits, with a chief of division at $3,500. No doubt the same facts apply to him, do they not?

Mr. WARREN. Yes. Mr. HARRISON. Then the appropriation is for the salary of this gentleman for the year 1922

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that salary has been appropriated for heretofore.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. It has been paid out of the sum appropriated for "expenses of loans." Now, we are going to provide for the office under the commissioner of the public debt and appropriate direct for the salaries of the employees during the fiscal year 1922. The provision reads:

For the salaries of officers and employees during the fiscal year 1922 at annual rates as follows (now being paid from the appropriation "Expenses of loans").

We make here specific appropriations for them.

Mr. HARRISON. Why was it not carried in one of the general appropriation bills?

Mr. SMOOT. It was carried in a lump-sum appropriation, as the Senator from Wyoming has stated, in the legislative appropriation bill. Now, however, we specifically provide that the amounts shall not hereafter be paid from the lump-sum appropriation for "Expenses of loans," but we name the offices and appropriate for them. That is what we are going to do in the future, if we can.

Mr. HARRISON. And the same statement applies to the "assistant chief of division at $2,500; clerks—one at $2,250, one $2,000, one $1,800, one $1,600, one $1,400; messenger, $840; assistant messenger, $720; in all $16,610 "?

That is in the Division of Deposits. Those items cover salaries from the 1st of July, 1921, to the 1st of July, 1922, and yet they are placed in a deficiency appropriation bill. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct, but there are certain increases,

I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Touching the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, there is an appropriation carried in this bill-

For the force to be transferred to this division on account of the transfer of duties from the Division of Public Moneys, at annual rates of compensation during the fiscal year 1922, as follows.

The bill provides an assistant chief of division at $2,500. That is for his salary from the 1st of July, 1921, to the 1st of July, 1922. That is correct, is it not?

WARREN. It is stated specifically in the provision which the Senator has read that that is a transfer of the force. Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but the item provides for salaries for 1922, which is not a deficiency.

Mr. SMOOT. The legislative appropriation bill that passed Congress provided for this appropriation.

Mr. HARRISON. What are we appropriating it again for? Mr. SMOOT. Because, instead of a lump sum, we are appropriating straight here, and it will not be paid from the lump

Mr. HARRISON. What is going to be done with the lump sum which was appropriated to pay these particular officers,

Mr. SMOOT. Why, it goes into the Treasury. Mr. HARRISON. Does it go back, or will it be spent for other employees?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it can not be.
Mr. HARRISON. Why can it not be? If it is a lump sum, why can it not be expended by the men in charge of it? The Senator smiles; but may I ask the Senator, if it is a lump-sum appropriation appropriated to the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, whatever that may be, have they not a right to spend that money during the fiscal year 1921?

Mr. SMOOT. They could, but they will not. Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has more faith in some of them than I have; so they can spend it if they want to. It may be, therefore, that the Government is appropriating money twice here for these officers. Is not that true?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator should not ask a question of that kind. The lump sum is appropriated for the year ending the 30th of June.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. Now, no matter what money they have left, Mr. WARREN. when the end of June comes that draws the line, because we have stated in our legislation that it shall end then. Now, of course, those men will be paid up until that time from that appropriation

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator mean the 30th of June.

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator has stated, and as the chairman of this committee has admitted time and time again, there are in this bill these items for 1922; but the particular items that the Senator is asking about do not increase the expense of the Government and do not make new places as far as expenses are concerned. They simply provide appropriations under laws that we have passed.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator from Utah said that this appropriation had been made in a lump sum. Now the Senator from Wyoming says it has not been made in a lump sum except up to June 30, 1921.

Mr. WARREN. It is made in a lump sum for the year 1921; and as to what is not so used at the end of 1921, that is the end of it.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; so now we are making an additional

Mr. WARREN. No; we are not doing anything of the kind.

We make an appropriation for 1922.

Mr. SMOOT. What the Senator wanted to have said was that it was two appropriations. You can not transfer the employees without transferring the amount of the appropriation, and that is what it says. If it is $16,610, it specifically states what the employees are and the amount that is to be transferred, and that is the only way in which they can get the money to pay these employees under the commissioner of the public debt that are now paid from the expenses of loans.

Mr. HARRISON. And the Senator does not think that that division could expend that amount of money that had been appropriated for in the other bill in the lump-sum appropriation?

Mr. SMOOT. It is transferred to the new account. Mr. HARRISON. So it can not be spent again?

Mr. SMOOT. It can not be spent twice. Mr. HARRISON. All right. That is the best explanation the Senator has made.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question? There is no transfer in this language. This is an additional appropriation, in addition to whatever may have been appropriated under the lump sum.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the way I figured it.

Mr. SMOOT. It says here:

For the salaries of officers and employees during the fiscal year 922 at annual rates as follows (now being paid from the appropriation Expenses of loans"):

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but that is not any transfer of funds

Mr. SMOOT. .It says here: "In all, $16,610," and that will be transferred out of the appropriation.

Mr. LENROOT. No; not under that language.

Mr. SMOOT. Then they could not pay anything, if it is not. Mr. LENROOT. This is an additional appropriation of that amount.

Mr. SMOOT. But it is a transfer of an amount,

Mr. LENROOT. No; there is no transfer.
Mr. HARRISON. It is the force that is to be transferred.

Mr. SMOOT. Then there is no other appropriation made for them, is there?

Mr. HARRISON. There was a lump-sum appropriation made for that force before it had been transferred. Now we are appropriating an additional amount, and we will hear of the great saving of the party that is now in power, and you will be credited with that. I will ask the Senator from Utah, is that just right?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I expected the Senator from Mississippi, because I know him so well and he is so agreeable always, to raise a fog on this matter, simply to get some political talk out of it.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I am not talking politics. Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that the chance is open for him; but these appropriations made for 1922 were made after the Republicans had the majority in the Senate and House, and so, if they cut too close, they cut in their own cloth, and it can not be said that they cut against the Democratic Party and in favor of the Republicans.

Mr. HARRISON. Why does the Senator say that the chance is open to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WARREN. Because I have never known an opportunity to come along for him to get in a political argument when he did not diligently take advantage of it.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not talking politics now.

Mr. WARREN. Of course I honor him, and I must not only honor him but respect and admire him accordingly.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to ask the Senator from Wyominghe and I get along very well together-a question. I notice in the amendment with regard to the General Land Office here:

For additional employees during the fiscal year 1922 at annual rates of compensation as follows: Law examiners—4 at $2,000 each, 8 at $1,800 each, 20 at $1,600 each; 8 clerks at $1,400 each; in all, $65,500.

That is to provide for the salaries of these places from July 1, 1921, to July 1, 1922, is it not? And that was carried in the lump-sum appropriation in the other bill?

Mr. WARREN. It was not carried at all.

Mr. HARRISON. That never has been carried?

Mr. WARREN. They did not have the employees. We have cut down that department with others heretofore very mate-Then came this legislation which the Senator has stated, and these oil leases—I have given it some consideration my-self—are piled up there by the hundreds. The moment that those leases are signed and issued the Government gets its royalty and money comes in; so that, as a matter of fact, it is one of the appropriations that bring not only the same money in return but a hundred times as much.

Mr. HARRISON. So, as I understand the Senator, these places were cut out in the other bill—is that right—which effected an apparent saving?

Mr. WARREN. Not these particular places, because the Senator will see

Mr. HARRISON. Well, some other places were cut out.

Mr. WARREN. These and many more were cut out.

Mr. HARRISON. They were cut down?
Mr. WARREN. Not in the last bill, but they were cut down in preceding bills, three or four of them.

Mr. HARRISON. And so the report went to the country that there was going to be a saving effected in the cutting out of some useless places, and now we walk back up the hill and we put in 4 places at $2,000 each, 8 at $1,800 each, 20 at $1,600 each, and 8 at $1,400 each. That is the way I understand this to be.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator think those salaries for those lawyers are too much?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, no; but what I can not understand exactly is that you cut out some places and attempt to get the credit for cutting out useless places, and then the first chance you get after doing that you put in some new places, as I have read here from this amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask the Senator from Wyoming if all of these places are under the civil service? I notice that there are several hundred places created in the bill. Are they all under the civil service, or not?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes; so far as the laws require. Mr. McKELLAR. All of them are?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes. Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President-

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask a question before the Senator from Utah goes on? What difference does the civil service make in the firing of employees? They pay no attention to the spirit or letter of the civil-service act touching apportionments. They can fire all from the State of Tennessee and retain all from the State of Ohio.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is no need of calling attention to the fact that on the 1st day of July thousands of employees will be separated from the Government service; and that has been taking place right along, I will say to the Senator, for months past. I have here the report of the commission. I will go back to October, say.

During the month of October, 1920, there was a decrease in the employees in the Government service of 516.

For the month of November, 1920, there was a decrease in the employees in the Government service of 701.

In the month of December, 1920, there was a decrease in the employees in the Government service of 986.

In the month of January, 1921, there was a decrease in the employees in the Government service of 513.

In the month of March, 1921, there was a decrease in the employees in the Government service of 611.

In the month of April, 1921, there was a decrease in the employees in the Government service of 680.

Mr. President, every month since last October there has been, on an average, a decrease in the employees in the Government service of over 700. Now, if the Senator thinks that because of the fact that there are 20 or 30 employees added to a department of our Government because of legislation that was passed, that is an increase in the number of employees, he is mistaken. I have not with me at my desk now the decreases which took place before this, but at this time, on the 1st day of June, there are over 400 less employees in the War Risk Insurance Bureau than there were last month.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the Senator think there ought to be a great reduction in those forces?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Those forces were built up under war conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr, HARRISON. And there should be a great reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. In the War Risk Bureau there were over 19,000 employees during the war. To-day there are less than 5,000; and there are too many now, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes: I think so.

Mr. SMOOT. And they will be cut down. In the general appropriations that were made, we have not provided for the same number of employees for 1922.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I think the Senator is a little inaccurate in his statement that there were ever 19,000 employees in the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it was a little over 19,000; I will say 19,483, if I remember correctly.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think the Senator is correct. Mr. SMOOT. I think I can show the Senator the correct. I think I can show the Senator the exact number from the time I began to keep track of the number of employees. I think it was 19,483 at one time.

Mr. GLASS. I think perhaps when the Senator examines his figures he may be able to curtail it by three, anyway.

Mr. SMOOT. What does the Senator say it was? Mr. GLASS. As I recall, the peak of employment showed something less than 15,000 employees.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well, the Senator does not remember it correctly; I am sure of that. Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield? Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield. Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call the Senator's attention to page 86 of the bill, the amendment with regard to the War Risk Insurance Bureau, where it provides-

That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum except the following: Three at not exceeding $7,500 each—

That is the same as a Senator's salary.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the same as the law is to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then why change it? [Reading:]

Nine at not exceeding $5,000 each, 28 at not exceeding $4,500 each, 36 at not exceeding $4,000 each, 42 at not exceeding $3,500 each, 49 at not exceeding $3,000 each, 68 at not exceeding $2,500 each, and 215 at not exceeding $2,000 each.

It just strikes me that that looks like an increase.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me? It does not increase the appropriation one penny.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that, but it does allow the salaries to be increased.

Mr. WARREN. It does. Mr. McKELLAR. It does that.

Mr. SMOOT. In some cases.

Mr. McKELLAR. I imagine that that is the purpose of it; and I just wanted to say that so far as economy in the employment of persons by the Government is concerned, this bill does not look as if it is even tending that way, judging from those

Mr. SMOOT. If Col. Forbes, the head of the bureau, tells the committee the truth-and I have every reason to believe that he does—as soon as this provision comes along there will be a great saving of money at the War Risk Bureau, and that is what it is put in here for.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, if you can save money by increasing salaries, why, then, money can be saved; but my understanding of arithmetic is that when you pay a great number of employees very much larger salaries it is not a saving, though I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not know the facts, or he would not make that statement about arithmetic. If you can give a man a salary of $3,500 and have him do the exact work that is being done to-day for $6,000, there is a saving, is there not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, that may be so, but-

Mr. SMOOT. Well, that is exactly the case here.

Mr. McKELLAR. This provides for an increase in these salaries, and I want to ask the Senator this question.

That is the result of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Do you make the office statutory when you provide for it in this way? You make the salaries statutory, do you not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the statutory salaries are only up to $1,800.

They apply only to clerks.

Mr. McKELLAR. What does the increase in these salaries mean? What would be the total number of clerks? It looks as if there are something over 40 whose salaries are greater I figure the number at about 400.

Mr. SMOOT. There are not 400.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can the Senator give us any information as to what the increase in salaries would be for over 400 clerks?

Mr. SMOOT. There are not increases for 400 clerks, Mr. McKELLAR. I have just figured it up. It is just a little over 400.

Mr. SMOOT. That is mentioned here; but the Senator has not figured up how many are taken care of at exactly the same rates by existing law.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, the item is very easy of explanation. The Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau represented to the committee that by getting a higher class of men for these major positions, for which he must necessarily pay higher salaries than have hitherto prevailed, he could rid the bureau of quite a number of inferior men, produce a very much greater efficiency in the administration of the bureau, and not increase the sum total of the appropriation a dollar.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, how can that be done when the civil-service rolls are closed at this time? They are not adding names to the lists, and necessarily the more efficient help must come out of the bureau. Does the Senator mean to say that Col. Forbes said that he was going to take the same employees, or certain of the same employees, and by paying them larger salaries make them more efficient? I do not know how he could accomplish it otherwise, because they have to come from the Civil Service Commission, as the Senator from Wyoming has said, and we know that is the law. Mr. GLASS. There is such a thing possible as making a man more efficient by paying him a larger salary. I have known it to be done.

Mr. McKELLAR. The times are few and far between.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, there are very few people in the War Risk Bureau who are getting an excessive salary. That is an institution which does more business in the aggregate than the five great insurance companies of this country, and yet there are men there doing devoted work for the Government who are not getting the wages of an elevator boy.

Mr. WARREN. This is only a raise of salaries for 3 per cent of the men; it is for less than three men out of a hundred.

Mr. McKELLAR. It may be entirely all right, but I just wanted an explanation. I know the men there in the War Risk Insurance Bureau are trying faithfully to do their duty. think they are doing it now, with their present salaries. If their salaries ought to be raised, that is another thing. merely call attention to the fact that the raising of salaries at this time is not in the line of economy.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator to consider the provision that there shall be three at not exceeding $7,500. That is the law to-day. There is no increase of the $7,500 salaries at all. Take the next one, nine at not exceeding $5,000. To-day there are five, and there is an increase of four in the number who are to draw up to $5,000. That is, they are authorized to pay that number of employees in the War Risk Bureau up to $5,000nine of them. The Senator says there are 215 clerks at not exceeding $2,000 provided for, and he thinks that is a large number. But there are about 187 of them to-day, and there is only the difference between that number and 215. As the Senator from Wyoming has said, it is only an increase of about 3 per cent, or a little less than that. Mr GLASS. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison] for just a word, I respectfully submit that we are not making progress on the bill by this sort of criticism at this time. If anybody wants to know, these items, beginning with line 9, on page 75, down to the end of the chapter, are irregular. The committee has not sought to conceal that fact. They came over from the House embodied in a deficiency appropriation bill. The Senate committee was so averse to that sort of procedure that it would have liked to strike them out altogether, but representations were made to the committee as to the urgent necessity for most of the appropriations. So the committee adopted the scheme of segregating all items that were not actual deficiencies under the head of emergencies.

When we reach that section of the bill, if any Senator objects to any one of the appropriations upon the merits of the case he is at liberty to make a point of order, and out it will go.

That is all there is to it.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Senator. I am just trying to ascertain whether or not I should make points of order when we get to that, and I want to ask the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Wyoming a question in this regard. I notice that for additional employees in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce during the fiscal year 1922 the annual rates of compensation are as follows: Two assistant directors, at $4,000 each; expert on commercial laws in foreign countries, $4,000. Are those new places, or is that just the salary already provided?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will designate whom he is asking, I shall endeavor to answer. I do not believe I care to answer a question asked of two Senators simultaneously. If it is a question propounded to me, I shall endeavor to answer it.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from Wyoming or the Senator from Utah, either one. The salaries that are provided are for two assistant directors at $4,000 each, and an expert on commercial laws in foreign countries, at $4,000. Are those new places?

Mr. WARREN. They are new so far as they are designated in the bill for 1922, but are provided for at present, as the others have been, under lump sums. Let me say in that connection, on the subject which the Senator had up last, as to the Treasury, that there was a cut from $12,000,000 to $3,-Then at the end of the year was a termination of doing business that way, and we have taken up probably a lesser number and at a lesser expense, in providing for this division for 1922, than they have had since the peak of the appropriations in the war times. Yet the work of the Secretary of the Treasury and that department is immense to-day, as the Senator knows, because of the great foreign debt, which must be put in shape. Then there is the collection from the railroads of their loans; there are the short-term bonds, all of which must be taken up, and other provisions made, and matters of that kind. As a matter of fact, we have not increased the appropriations at all, but have decreased; but it is handled now in a way which makes it possible for us to check it up at any time It is stabilized now, in a way, sufficiently, so that we felt we could do it.

Mr. HARRISON. But this is to provide salaries for these places for 1921 and 1922?

Mr. WARREN. It is. Mr. HARRISON. The Senator agrees with the Senator from Virginia that the Senate Committee on Appropriations did not agree with the House Appropriations Committee in the insertion of these items, and was very much opposed to them, but did reclassify them and put them under the emergency provisions of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. We have classified them there, but nevertheless they are House items, and I very much doubt whether there is any Senate rule under which we can throw out a direct appropriation put in by the House on a point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senate does throw out items put in by the House, does it not?

Mr. WARREN. They go to conference, and the conferees settle the differences between the two Houses.

Mr. HARRISON. But you throw them out? Mr. WARREN. Not on points of order.

Mr. HARRISON. No; but I mean in the committee. committee could have thrown out all these items if they had not agreed to them?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and the Senate can throw them out if they wish.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senate committee, as I understand it, thought that the House Appropriations Committee should not have incorporated them in this bill, because they were not deficiencies?

Mr. WARREN. They should have provided for them, but we thought they should have put them, as we did, under a different heading; that is all.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senate committee did strike out the item of $250,000 under the Foreign and Domestic Commerce Bureau, did they not?

Mr. WARREN. We struck it out in one place and inserted it in another. That is often done, simply changing the paragraph $250,000 here and adds it in another place.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator ought to asperse the committee in any such way as that, attributing to it a thimblerigging process. The committee has not done any-The committee has been absolutely frank thing of that sort. with the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Absolutely; and those things are introduced in this manner so that the Senate can see them readily.

Mr. GLASS. I did not undertake to say that the committee had not agreed upon the merits of these various propositions. We did deprecate the processes which were adopted in the other House of including in a deficiency bill things that were not deficiencies. If I may make a representation to the Senator from Mississippi of one item here

Mr. McKELLAR. What page?

Mr. GLASS. Page 85, in the item appropriation for the office of the Comptroller of the Currency. It was frankly stated to the committee that owing to the utter antipathy of Congress toward the former incumbent of that office—which, incidentally, I do not undertake to justify, but totally disagree with—the office had been starved for nearly eight years, and the only way the work of the office could be done was to have clerks assigned from other branches of the Treasury Department. the recommendations of the respective Secretaries of the Treasury were regarded, owing to the dislike here on the hill to the incumbent of the office.

Now, this surplus of clerks in other branches of the Treasury, or, more correctly speaking, those clerks who at times would have sufficient leisure to devote their activities to the business of the comptroller's office, are largely being dropped, and some provision must be made now for the continuance of the business of that office, and the only way to make it is to appropriate for it. I am not saying that it should have been done in this way, but it ought to be done in some way; otherwise the business of the comptroller's office will be damaged and the public interest hurt.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has exactly stated the case. Mr. HARRISON. I am very glad the provision is made for those employees, then, under those circumstances. I am merely trying to get information about the bill. The Senator from Wyoming said that the $250,000 appropriation that was carried for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce had been eliminated in one place but placed in another place. On what page of the bill is it provided for?

Mr. SMOOT. On page 93, where it is provided:

Export industries: To enable the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to investigate and report on domestic and foreign problems relating to the production, distribution, and marketing, in so far as they relate to the important export industries of the United States, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, including Latin America and the Far East, and all necessary incidental expenses connected therewith, fiscal year 1922, $250,000.

Mr. HARRISON. It is in the exact wording in which it appeared in the bill, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. It is just placed under the emergency item,

Mr. SMOOT. That is all.

Mr. HARRISON. Ordinarily that provision would not be carried in a deficiency bill?

Mr. SMOOT. No.
Mr. HARRISON. Because it is not a deficiency. Ordinarily, if we were following the rules of the Congress, both the Senate and the House, it would go in the legislative appropriation bill, would it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. So it is not a deficiency at all?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. HARRISON. The sum of $250,000 of the appropriation of the million dollars for the Bureau of the Census for the fiscal year 1922 is transferred over to the Bureau of Standards, as the Senator from Utah says. Is that correct?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, he is opening up a subject that requires some discussion. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] desires an executive session. I should be glad to lay aside the bill temporarily for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely wish to say, before the Senate goes into executive session, that we have just voted on the naval appropriation bill that carried $495,000,000. That was passed by a vote of 54 to 17. There were five of the majority party who voted against that enormous and stupendous appropriation. The next bill taken up is the deficiency appropriation bill, which Senators in charge of the bill say carries with it appropriations for jobs for the year 1922 that are not deficiencies, carries with it appropriations for various things that are not deficiencies, carries with it appropriations for increased salaries for Government employees. It seems to me that it is not keeping the faith and it is not keeping the pledges that they made to the American people that they were going to cut down appropriations and economize in the matter of useless jobs in the Government serv-

Mr. LODGE. Sixty million dollars that they are carrying in the bill is to pay for the extravagances which the Senator's party pushed us into in connection with the Shipping Board.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I will try to make it clear. I said that $60,000,-000 of the amount carried in the pending bill is for expenses bequeathed to us by the Senator's party in connection with the Shipping Board.

Mr. WARREN. It is over $100,000,000.

Mr. LODGE. It is $100,000,000, the chairman of the committee informs me; and the Senator from Mississippi is fretting over these little salaries when we are trying to clear off that vast amount of debt and mismanagement left by the Senator's party for us to take care of.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; to provide for the head of the Standard Oil Co. or the United States Steel Corporation as president of the Shipping Board. But the Senator from Mas-achusetts did not understand that what I am complaining about is that in one bill they try to cut out a lot of useless jobs and in the next bill they increase salaries and create jobs.

Mr. LODGE. I understood what the Senator said. He said it over fifteen or twenty times.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 2, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 1, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, unto whom all hearts are open, all desires grow, and from whom no secrets are hid, cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of Thy Holy Spirit, that we may perfectly love Thee and worthily magnify Thy holy name. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE CHIEF JUSTICE WHITE.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the remarks of Mr. Justice McKenna, Presiding Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, at the meeting of the court on yesterday in connection with the death of late Chief Justice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to insert in the Record the remarks of Mr. Justice McKenna in connection with the death of the late Chief Justice White. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the remarks referred to:

"Gentlemen of the Bar: This empty chair, and the sombre drapery upon it, announce that since the last sitting of the Court a grievous affliction has come to the country and to us-an affliction which to some of us, and, it may be, to all of us, can never have complete solace. A great life has ceased to exist, one replete with achievements—achievements in many fields of endeavor, all typical and demonstrative of ability and merit, of which, to adopt the words of another, 'it would be difficult to say anything that would transcend the bounds of a just and decorous eulogy.' Eulogy, however, will be the purpose and appointment of another time, and of other lips than mine. To mine now is the humbler and sadder deputation to express the sorrow of my brethren and myself at the death of our Chief Justice. But, expressing a more poignant and personal sorrow. may I not say, at the death of our associate in duties, our companion in council, our friend and intimate. He was all of these to us, and by them animated and directed our work; his precedence veiled under a considerate courtesy, our intercourse with him made a real enjoyment. I use the word 'enjoyment' because I speak in retrospection-speak of a time upon which sorrow had not cast its shadow.

I hope I shall be pardoned these personal considerations. do not overlook or underestimate the greater abilities that attracted the Nation's commendation in his life, and has caused the Nation's sorrow in his death-a sorrow in which we participate. But his faculties need not be distinguished; they were comprehensive in their action, had connection and purpose, were as manifest in private life as in official life.

"In private life he was a gentleman in the best sense of that much abused word. He was considerately kind and courteous, and not in passing show, for he was incapable of artifice or dissimulation.

In official life he had a high and earnest sense of duty, and duty to a judge has a special incentive; its object is justice, and justice to the fullness of its definition, 'the constant and perpetual wish to render to every man his rights.' This wish was ever in the Chief Justice's mind-its insistent motive and ani-And in this duty to individual serious questions came, mation. questions of the validity of laws and executive acts and the ordination of the powers of the United States and the States, granted or reserved to them respectively by the Constitution. To the questions thus presented the Chief Justice directed a consideration proportioned to their immediate and ultimate effect, the public welfare depending upon them. He realized. as all of us must realize, that the necessity of passing upon them marks the place and power of the Federal judiciary in our scheme of Government—the condition, it may be, of its stability and permanence, preserving always the splendid conception of the Constitution--one sovereignty constituted of many-it being supreme within the sphere of its powers, they being supreme within the sphere of their powers, resulting in governments, national and State, competent to encounter and resolve the problems incident to or emergent in the lives and affairs of a people.

"This is of the past in barest outline-what of the future? Anticipating it, I see no shadow on his fame, no lessening of his example nor of the impression his life and services have made upon the country. I venture comparisons. I make full concession of the recognized and illustrious merit of those who have preceded him. I make full admission, in assured prophecy, of the abilities of those who will succeed him, yet, considering his qualities and their exercises, I dare to say that, as he has attained, he will forever keep a distinct eminence among the Chief Justices of the United States,

"In testimony of his worth, in tribute and respect to his memory, the court will adjourn until to-morrow at 12 o'clock."

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS AT ARLINGTON.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I asked unanimous consent on yesterday to insert in the RECORD the President's address at Arlington on Memorial Day. I did not have yesterday an authentic copy of the address. I ask that I may insert the address in the RECORD of to-day.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman already has permission to insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. MONDELL. That permission holds; but I desire to place it in the body of the RECORD at this time. Mr. GARNER. The gentleman wants to put it in the RECORD at this point?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to place the President's address in the Record at this point. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the President's address delivered at Arlington Memorial Day:

"We are met on sacred soil to-day for a solemn hour of sacrament and consecration. But the soil whence we come is itself sanctified through the sacrifices of those who lie here. Wherever our flag flies within the boundaries of the Republic, it is over lands whose freedom and security have been wrought through these sacrifices.

'It is the privilege of this company to utter our tribute of love and gratitude in this sacristy of beauty within the sight of the National Capital. But others, no less devout, will assemble all over our land and other lands, under foreign skies and among alien peoples, to pay like tribute of love and memory. There is no discordant note in the hymn of gratitude. With old wounds healed and a new generation's offerings on the altars of our patriotism, there is no sectionalism in our memorial. Among the murmurings of grief is the swelling concord of union, and the dominant note is our faith in the Re-

" MANY TONGUES, MANY RACES.

"It will be a tribute to-day spoken in many tongues and by diverse races. Wherever men are free they are wont to give thought to our country's service in freedom's cause. men may but aspire to a freedom not yet achieved, their instinct turns the eye and the thought of hope this way, and they pray that their cause may gain our approbation. They know that we have never drawn the sword of oppression, that we have not sought what was not our own, nor taken all that we might have claimed. They have seen our protecting arm stretched over the outposts of liberty on every continent.

For more than a century our plighted word warned tyranny from half the world; then, when the gauge was taken up by mad ambition, men felt the blow that arm could strike when freedom answered in its utmost might. Across the seas we sent our hosts of liberty's sons, commissioned 'to redress the eternal scales.' To-day the sons and daughters of other lands to which they gave their all are placing with loving hands their laurels on American graves not less reverently than we are doing here.

" NOW AN INTERNATIONAL DAY.

"To me no thought comes with more of inspiration than this, that now our Memorial Day is become an international occasion; that it calls upon the fortunate free of many lands and countries to help in its observance; and that equally to them and us it is a reminder of our common troth to civilization, humanity, and everlasting justice.

"There are gathered here the ashes of a great army of those who fought in the struggle which preserved our Union and insured our high place in the community of nations. Our debt to them will never be paid, but we can come, for them and for ourselves, on this national commemoration day to attest our veneration and undying love. They rendered a service greater than they knew, for they saved our Nation to the cause of human freedom and paved the way to that power and influence which enabled it to play its part in behalf of all mankind in the time of supreme crisis of the world.

We will not overappraise their sacrifice if we say that had they failed their failure would have so weakened the forces of liberty and enlightenment that these would have been doomed. in the more recent world trial, to failure and defeat. A divided America would have been incapable of the effort that was demanded to hold our present-day civilization secure. The heroic dead, for whom the day was originated, preserved the ark of the covenant of union and nationality, and in that service they made possible the exalted place so recently won for our country.

"Our own generation will not perform a part worthy of its heritage if we do less than our very utmost to preserve that which they made possible for us to possess. Nay, more, we shall not be our most and best at home if we do not resolve for all time that the differences which brought us to civil conflict were due to ambiguities in our Union and the disputes between two schools of political thought, and when we made the Union indissoluble and the Nation supreme we left our people one flag, one purpose, one pride, and one destiny.

"LOYALTY TO SELF FIRST,

"In such a view we must see that our opportunity to be useful to mankind at large depends first on being loyal to ourselves. No ideal of generosity to all men can justify neglect first to make ourselves strong, firm, secure, in behalf of our own people. We can not hope to discharge the wider responsibilities if we have not first proved our capacity to meet the narrower ones. It is our wish to be useful in the greater realms, but if we are to do so we must have no question of our devotion to the great principles for which these gave their lives in the struggle which saved the Union and rededicated it forever to liberty. I counsel measure of its performance we will find the true gauge of our capacity to be helpful to others.

It is a good thing to come to this consecrated place and renew the pledges of our loyalty to those whose patriotism gave us our strength and opportunity. They did not know, they could not know, for what greater things they were laying the foundations. Yet their instinct led them to the judgment that their first duty was to preserve the institution of popular rule, of national solidarity.

" FOUGHT TO MAINTAIN UNION.

"They did not enter upon the war among the primary purpose to end the institution of human slavery. Wor-"They did not enter upon the war among the States with thy as that might have been, their inspiration was higher. sought first to maintain the Union, to keep it a power for the advancement of America and humanity, confident that if they won all other rightful things in due time would be achieved. They were right then; in the end slavery received its decree of banishment from this continent, and at last from the world.

"But let me repeat, that great achievement for humanity was not the aim with which they entered upon our internecine trouble. They were called to prevent secession, to save the national unity. They believed that the institutions of this country were good; that they deserved to be preserved; that they were worth supreme effort, even all of life itself. In making that effort and that sacrifice, they did far more than save what had already been gained; they made possible for slavery to be ended forever.

"KILLED DIVINE RIGHT TO RULE.

"It was the same in the more recent war of the free peoples against the autocracies of the world. In its beginnings men fought to protect that which they already had. Their countries' lives were at stake; their rights as free men were menaced; and for these they went forth to battle. There was no thought of crusading for the freedom of a world, of emancipating distant peoples, of rendering a noble service to the enemy who had attacked them. They had no time and small disposition to indulge altruisms.

Yet, as in the case of our Civil War, they won far more than they had sought in the beginning. They won for themselves their homes, their countries; and in doing so they destroyed well-nigh the last intrenchments of the mistaken doctrine of divine right to rule. They gained the victory for their own grateful countries, and with it they won, for those whom they defeated, the opportunity of establishing free institutions, of planting democracies where absolutism held sway, of making the people supreme.

"FREEDOM OFFERED TO FOE.

"True, they were able only to afford opportunity for the great advance. They could not force free institutions upon the crushed and broken enemy; they could not insure that those institutions would be permanent even if experimentally adopted. Freedom is not to be crowded upon those who will not have it; but the privilege of adopting and having and enjoying it that privilege was opened wide to the vanquished communities which had sought to take it from others. We do not yet know certainly whether the defeated and unwilling beneficiaries will be able to grasp this boon. We can not tell whether they will pay the price required to maintain the freedom to which the door has been opened. We do know, and we take pride, that our sons and brothers afforded them the opportunity.

"NATION'S WEALTH IN SOULS.

"Thus we see that, whether in our civil struggle or in the World War, the triumph of the right inevitably implies gains that sweep far beyond the immediate issue. Those heroes of the Civil War who sleep about us here wrote that lesson in symbols of blood and fire where all men might read. And they did yet more. They taught the lesson of a great community making its fight for freedom and exclusive business of the whole Never before had there been an example, on such a scale, of the entire human and industrial power of a people being cast into the common cause. Wars had largely been professional affairs, in the hands of trained people, waged by conscripts whose knowledge or concern for the cause they served was of necessity limited and doubtful.

"Here was found a nation which for four years gave its very all of human resource, of industrial power, of faith in its mission and its future, in order that it might maintain an ideal. It accomplished much which experts and econor ists de-cried as the impossible. It defied the edict that economic ex-haustion and financial disabilities must prevent a decisive victory. It demonstrated that the wealth and resources of a no selfishness, no little Americanism, no mere parochialism, nation lie not in acres and bushels, in bank balances and ton-when I urge that our first duty is to our own, and that in the nages, in taxable wealth and going business, but rather in the nation lie not in acres and bushels, in bank balances and tonsinews and souls of its inspired people. And therein the example of our fraternal struggle taught the lesson which later moved agonized civilization to reject an indecisive peace.

" MUST KEEP WHAT MEN WON.

"So much, and vastly more, we owe of debt to these who won the peace of union and liberty. It is a debt that has not yet been discharged in `ull, a debt on which every succeeding gen-eration can hope only to pay its installment; for it obligates us and those after us to maintain for this people the high estate which they established. We never will yield aught of what they won for us. Forbidden by the law of life and institution, we can not stand still. We must always move forward along the upward path: they marked for us. No less is possible unless we could repudiate the debt they laid upon us, whose convenant they sealed in their blood.

Thus appraising and this acknowledging our responsibility, we will do well to consider the particular burdens it lays upon We look about us on a world troubled and torn groping for a way back to light and opportunity. We find ourselves, as a people, occupying a place of vast responsibility in that world. We stand among the leaders to whom it looks for guidance and direction. We are blessed with wealth and with the instit 1tions of freedom, with the magnificent tradition that comes to us from those whom to-day we honor. We can not evade, if we would, for mankind is fallen on times when there is no hope for it if some communities seek isolation while others indulge unrestrained ambition for empire. Civilization must disaster if there shall be denial either of common responsibility or of essential equality among sovereign States and persons.

"THE DISCIPLINE OF PEACE.

"We have heard much about the danger of winning the war and losing the peace. But is there not, in the example of those who made the ultimate sacrifice, a lofty inspiration to the same singleness of purpose, the same readiness to sink individual for the sake of general good, that moved them? Though they were not trained to military forms and evolutions, yet they learned to stand together in unbroken line, to move as unities, to forget the individual for the sake of the mass. Surely there is no reason why peace may not achieve discipline, unification, directness of purpose as war does. It requires the same submergence of selfish ends, the same relinquishment of the merely personal gratifications, the same regard for the common interest. I am not counseling surrendered independ-Our maintained freedom is the source of our might. ence. Only the American conscience may command this Republic.

'It is, indeed, a very different matter to achieve the discipline that peace commands. There is not the urge of instant danger, the rigor of authority to overcome that danger. It is needful to bring into subjugation the thoughtless mind, the indulgent disposition, the easy quest of pleasure, the lust of gains, the aspiration for power and personal satisfaction. is required to substitute saving for thoughtless spending, thrift for waste, unceasing productive effort for the simple expedient of spending the shortest time and least energy on the job.

"RESOLUTE PATRIOTISM HOUR'S NEED.

"During the war, when we were all intent on the great business of winning, we saw this discipline established in mine, factory, and farm occupations. We worried not a little about how extravagant we were; but, on the other hand, we all turned in and worked, and we made those years of the war period marvels of productiveness, despite that millions of workers were in the uniform and other millions were engaged in the special industries which war necessitated. With the return of peace this industrial discipline was thrown aside, not only in our own country but in every country that was in the war. A breakdown of morale accompanied it, and we find ourselves halting when we ought to move forward. We need a patriotism resolute in peace as well as a patriotism aflame in war.

"Nowhere were men prepared to cope with the new problem of peace; nowhere were they less prepared than in this country. But if we had failed to set up the machinery for liquidation of war conditions, we nevertheless came out with our producing organization less wrenched and shaken than was that of the European countries. Our soil had not been invaded; our people had not suffered the physical privations which were visited upon great communities elsewhere. We came forth with better credit, sounder currency, and a ratio of debt far less than those of either allied or enemy States.

" FOUND SOUL OF AMERICA.

"Though our sorrows seemed measureless, we were more lightly touched, and for griefs incurable there was compensation. We found the soul of America; we have the reborn spirit of the Republic.

"I know the aching hearts. It requires nearness to measure the burden of grief. Only a few days ago I saw more than 5,000 flag-draped coffins, tenanted with their heroic dead. Theirs was mute eloquence in protesting war, theirs was the supreme appeal for war's avoidance. The way to preserve honor without material waste and the costlier human sacrifice would be the surpassing memorial tribute.

We may not bestow it to-day, but we may fittingly resolve that the influence and example of our America shall point the way to such lofty achievement.

" WILL HOLD TORCH SAFE AND ALOFT."

"In the inspirations that we may gain through to-day's con-templation of the deeds of these, our heroes of all our wars, we are called to look toward to-morrow's obligations. Our country has never failed to measure up to the demands presented to it in behalf of humanity, and it never will. When it ceases to meet these drafts, it will no longer be our country; it will be, if that time ever comes, the wretched and decaying memorial of another civilization which has crumbled, of another ideal which has failed, of another ambition for men's happiness which somehow has gone awry.

"We feel, aye, in our hearts we know, that ours is not to be We believe that the torch will flame more brightly in our hands, that we will hold it safe and high aloft, and that its light will help, at least, to point the way for humanity on the path of safety and in the task of building for all time."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 4.

Senate concurrent resolution 4.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring),
That a joint commission is hereby created, to be known as the "Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry," which shall consist of five Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate and five Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker.

Said commission shall investigate and report to the Congress within 40 days after the passage of this resolution upon the following subjects:
1. The causes of the present condition of agriculture.
2. The cause of the difference between the prices of agricultural products paid to the producer and the ultimate cost to the consumer.
3. The comparative condition of industries other than agricultural products to such products,
5. The banking and financial resources and credits of the country, especially as affecting agricultural credits.
6. The marketing and transportation facilities of the country.

The commission shall include in its report recommendations for legislation which in its opinion will tend to remedy existing conditions, and shall specifically report upon the limitations of the powers of Congress in enacting relief legislation.

The commission shall elect its chairman, and vacancies occurring in the membership of the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments.

The commission shall include in its report recommendations for legislation which in its opinion will tend to remedy existing conditions, and shall specifically report upon the limitations of the powers of Congress in enacting relief legislation.

The commission shall elect its chairman, and vacancies occurring in the membership of the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments.

To the Committee on Rules.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

To-day is Calendar Wednesday. The SPEAKER.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, on the last Calendar Wednesday, among bills from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I called up House joint resolution 31. To-day I would like to withdraw the request to have that resolution considered and to call up the bill H. R. 6567 from the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the motion he made last Wednesday and calls up the bill indicated.

Mr. WALSH. He did not make any motion on last Wednes-It was a Union Calendar bill, and the House would automatically go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration. The gentleman is not obliged to withdraw that, because it can be considered some other day, if he so desires,

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the situation suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh] would be an anomaly if the House on motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Winslow] on the last Calendar Wednesday had resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a certain measure. bill to-day would naturally be the unfinished business, and you would have to have some such request as that of the gentle-man from Massachusetts [Mr. Winslow] to set it aside.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Masachusetts [Mr. Wins-Low] could call up another bill to-day if he so desired. The other matter might still be pending.

CONSOLIDATION OF TELEPHONE SYSTEMS.

The SPEAKER. There would be no difference in the result. The Clerk will report the bill indicated.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6567) to amend section 407 of the transportation act of 1920.

A bill (H. R. 6567) to amend section 407 of the transportation act of 1920 be, and it is hereby, amended by adding thereto a new paragraph designated as paragraph (9), as follows:

"(9) Upon application of one or more telephone companies for authority to consolidate their properties or a part thereof into a single company, or for authority for one or more such companies to acquire the whole or any part of the property of another telephone company or other telephone companies or the control thereof by the purchase of securities or by lease or in any other like manner, when such consolidated company would be subject to this act, the commission shall fix a time and place for a public hearing upon such application and shall thereupon give reasonable notice in writing to the governor of each of the States in which the physical property affected, or any part thereof, is situated, and to the State public service commission or other regulatory body, if any, having jurisdiction over telephone companies, and to such other persons as it may deem advisable. After such public hearing, if the commission finds that the proposed consolidation, acquisition, or control will be of advantage to the persons to whom service is to be rendered and in the public interest, it is hereby authorized to enter an order approving and authorizing the proposed transaction; and thereupon any act or acts of Congress making the proposed transaction unlawful shall not apply. Nothing in this paragraph contained shall be construed as in any wise limiting or restricting the powers of the several States as now existing to control and regulate telephone companies."

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 12, by striking out "it is hereby authorized to enter an order approving and authorizing the proposed transaction" and inserting "it shall certify to that effect."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the rule covering the consideration of this bill accords to those in opposition one hour's time.

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair thinks not. It is subject to the ordinary rules of the House. The gentleman has one hour, at the conclusion of which he may move the previous question. If not, he would have the right to recognize somebody or make

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this bill is very interesting. It appeals to everyone who uses the telephone in this country, whether for ordinary communica-tion purposes or for commercial purposes. The bill was brought to the attention of the committee by those representing a very large majority of the so-called independent telephone companies of the United States.

To sum it up briefly, I can say to you that those companies, broadly speaking, have found themselves in a very unhappy situation. Many of them—the great majority of them—are skating on very thin ice in respect of their financial operations. As the result their service is being interfered with, their credit greatly impaired, and they have represented to the committee personally and officially that if the opportunity to sell or con-solidate is not afforded to them they are liable to go through the condition of bankruptcy or receivership, and so forth, and have a consequent interruption of the service that they ought to render their subscribers.

In order, then, to protect the service in other communities and to guarantee as far as they may the integrity and value of investments made in these many companies, of which there are thousands, they have come to Congress and asked relief. That proposed relief has taken shape in this bill, H. R. 6567. In order that you may have a detailed statement as to the matters of law and various other features in connection with the formation of the bill, its legislative standing, and so forth, subcommittee which reviewed the bill, to make an explanation to the House, and I will accord to him 15 minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Before the gentleman does that, will be yield for a question?

Mr. WINSLOW. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. On page 2, beginning with line 14, I find this language:

and thereupon any act or acts of Congress making the proposed transaction unlawful shall not apply. Nothing in this paragraph contained shall be construed as in any wise limiting or restricting the powers of the several States as now existing to control and regulate telephone

You do not intend in this proposed language to prevent the Congress in the future from enacting any legislation that may affect these companies, do you?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will answer that.

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois. Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There is no such intention.

could not be construed in that way. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Graham] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in my judgment this bill is necessary for several reasons. It may not be generally appreciated—I will confess it was not appreciated by me until I became conversant with the facts that the consolidation of telephone companies in the United States is prohibited not only by the language of the Clayton Antitrust Act but probably by the language of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and that to-day in the United States it is impossible for any telephone companies which do an interstate business to lawfully consolidate their properties. This is due principally to the language of the Clayton Antitrust Act, to which I shall call attention briefly. Section 7 of that act, being the act of October 15, 1914, provides, in part-

That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of any other corporation engaged also in commerce where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community or tend to create a monopoly of any kind of commerce.

The provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act which have been held to apply to consolidations of telephone companies are as follows:

Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be illegal.

Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and punished accordingly.

Under this section of the Sherman Antitrust Act it is a peculiar fact that the courts of the United States have rendered entirely differing decisions as to the legal effect of it. For instance, in the courts of Ohio it has been held that companies that have made exclusive contracts with each other for a period of 99 years have done so in violation of the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act, while in North Dakota it has been held on an almost identical state of facts that such combinations or consolidations do not violate the spirit of the Sherman Anti-trust Act. (United States Tel. Co. v. Central Union Tel. Co., 202 Fed. Rep., 66; Pacific T. & T. Co. v. Anderson, 196 Fed. Rep., 699.) So there is great uncertainty in the minds of lawyers all over the country as to just how far there can be consolidation of telephone interests without violating the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act. It is absolutely certain that section 7 of the Clayton antitrust law prohibits the union of companies that are doing an interstate telephone business.

Now, the result of that has been that all over the country there have been duplications of telephone service. From 1895, which was about the earliest year in which there was any considerable telephone service in this country, up to about 1910, may be called the formative or constructive period of telephone service in the United States. From that time on the field for possible service has been pretty well saturated with telephones, and to-day I think I am stating the opinion of most men who have carefully considered the matter, that it is believed to be better policy to have one telephone system in a community that serves all the people, even though it may be at an advanced rate, properly regulated by State boards or commissions, than it is to have two competing telephone systems. There is nothing more exasperating, nothing that annoys the ordinary business man or the ordinary person more than to have two competing local telephone systems, so that he must have in his house It will be my pleasure to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. and in his office two telephones, on neither one of which he can Graham], representing the committee, and chairman of the

It will be noted that this bill has been prepared with great care to guard the interests of the States. Forty-five States in the Union have public utility commissions. Three Stateswhich I think are Texas, Iowa, and Delaware-have no jurisdiction over telephone companies through public utility commissions

Mr. MADDEN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes. Mr. MADDEN. While this bill seems to guard the rights of the people under State regulation, it does not appear anywhere to provide for any Federal regulation, and I assume that we are dealing with the interstate transmission of news or information, or whatever you may call it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly if we are authorizing the consolidation of these companies we are doing it because such consolidation at present violates Federal law. Are we the Federal laws loose after the passage of this bill? Are we to turn all

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I am glad the gentleman has asked this question, as it gives me an opportunity to explain that phase of the bill. The bill does not authorize the consolidation of telephone companies at all. It gives no authority for them to consolidate. In many States, in the gentleman's own State and my State, the consolidation of telephone companies is prohibited by law unless the consent of the State public utilities commission is obtained. That is true in many States of the Union. You will notice in the report filed with the bill a digest of the laws of the various States of the Union. You will observe by this bill, on page 2, that no authority is given to authorize a consolidation.

This is what is done:

After such public hearing, if the commission finds that the proposed consolidation, acquisition, or control will be of advantage to the persons to whom service is to be rendered and in the public interest, it shall certify to that effect; and thereupon any act or acts of Congress making the proposed transaction unlawful shall not apply.

Now, an amendment will be offered striking out this language, "it is hereby authorized to enter an order approving and authorizing the proposed transaction" and inserting this language,

"it shall certify to that effect."

So that, finally, after the Interstate Commerce Commission has made the findings, that it will be to the advantage of the persons to whom service is to be rendered and in the public interest, it shall make a certificate to that effect.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I was just talking to a member of the committee, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Johnson], as to what this means. The gentleman says it means the Interstate Commerce Commission and the gentleman from Mississippi says that that is a mistake. I would like to know what commission it refers to.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The only commission referred to is the Interstate Commerce Commission. There can be no other commission referred to, because the gentleman from Texas will understand that this act simply is to raise the bars of the Clayton and Sherman Antitrust Acts so that, other things being all right, they may consolidate and not incur the penalty of those particular laws.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I notice the language in the bill says: And thereupon any act or acts of Congress making the proposed transaction unlawful shall not apply.

That means apply to the transaction? Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Ought not the language to be amended so as to say "apply to such transactions"?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman means it would be a more grammatical construction?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The way it is written it might mean that it applied to the general law-that is, that the general law would not apply.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; the laws prohibiting consolidation would not apply; there are only two laws that seek to

Mr. JONES of Texas. So that there can be no doubt about it, why not insert the language "to such transactions," so that it would read "shall not apply to such transactions"?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Then you would have to remove the language "proposed transactions." That may be an advisable thing to do, but I am not sure. Let me again state briefly the substance of the act. It does not authorize a con-solidation; it does not authorize the purchase or sale of one telephone company to another; it does not authorize the acquisition of a majority of the stock of another company; it simply states that two telephone companies which do an interstate commerce business may make an application to the Interstate Commerce Commission and may have a hearing, after notice to the State authorities, and if the Interstate Commerce Commission is of the opinion, after the hearing, that it would be to the public interest and best good of the community, they may make a certificate to that effect, and thereupon the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law and the Clayton Act shall not apply, and they can make the consolidation so far as the Federal laws are concerned.

Mr. MADDEN. Was there anybody speaking for the public in favor of this bill?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; we had quite an extensive hearing before our subcommittee and the Senate subcommittee. The hearings are here and can be had by Members of the House.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Certainly.
Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman know of any other case or of any law that has ever been passed by Congress, or in any State in the Union, that authorizes a commission to set aside the provisions of law?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not know of any other law that has authorized the commission to do it, but I know that we have done it here in this House.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, yes; but we are the lawmaking body. If I understand the real essence of this bill, it is this: That it authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission in connection with the State commission to set aside the provisions of the Clayton Act and the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The State commission has nothing to do with it so far as we are concerned.

Mr. GARNER. Well, cut that out. It authorizes the Inter-state Commerce Commission to set aside the provisions of the Clayton Act and the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is true. Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. DENISON. I do not think that statement is accurate. This law does not authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to set aside the Clayton Act or the Sherman antitrust law. This act itself sets aside the Clayton Act and the Sherman antitrust law on the findings of fact by the commission.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think that is a more proper way

Mr. DENISON. We are not authorizing the commission to set aside the law, but their findings of a certain state of facts under this law sets aside the Sherman law and the Clayton

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is there anybody in the House who believes that competing telephone companies are a good thing? Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman let me answer that question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not suppose there are. The only question that arises here is as to the wisdom of rehabilitating property of people who went into a business without any solicitation on the part of anybody, but did it on their own judgment. We are reviving the value, or, in other words, guaranteeing them against loss by this legislation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; we are not guaranteeing them against loss, because there would not be any more value after this act was passed than before, except that the value that is in the property could be gotten out. Their securities would be worth something.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.
Mr. GARNER. Let us state a concrete illustration. Suppose there is a city of 100,000 people which has two telephone systems-

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Take the city of St. Louis, for exmple. That has two systems.

Mr. GARNER. Take any city the gentleman desires. One company buys out the other, and they levy a rate against the people for the service they are rendering. They take into consideration the cost of their plant in making that rate, and the State commission takes that into consideration in permitting the rate. So, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden] has suggested, you are only laying the foundation for the sell-ing out of these properties and levying upon the people in the respective communities a sufficient toll to make them profitable.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not agree with the gentleman at all, but I will say this, that so far as the money that is invested in telephone companies or any other company is concerned—and there have been $350,000,000 invested in independent companies throughout the United States and approximately $1,250,000,000 of money invested in the Bell systemsthat money has been properly invested, and it occurs to me that the people who invest it ought to be permitted to have the same right to sell their property or to realize from their investment that a man does who owns a farm or anything else. of the present laws prohibiting the using of such companies is to make it practically impossible for any telephone system anywhere in the country-and there are 12 of the large cities in the country that have competing telephone systems-to improve their service. It is impossible for them to get the money to rebuild their systems, and it is practically impossible for them to bond their properties and sell the bonds.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman in making that argument only confirms what I say.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Under present conditions the gentleman says it is impossible to get capital to make these properties profitable.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And he proposes a bill now that will do away with the inhibition against their consolidation and aid their consolidation, and he makes both of them profitable by levying on the people of their respective communities a sufficient toll to pay interest upon the bonded indebtedness.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That does not follow, because, after all, the regulation of the charge that shall be made on the people is a regulation that is made by the public utility bodies of the various States-a right which they exercise now, and a right which they will retain after the passage of this act. The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield me five minutes more.

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I want to preface my question by saying that I am in sympathy with what the gentleman wants to do, but there are questions that come up in my mind such as that suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. In my home there are two telephones. One of them will go out when this legislation is passed, because our town people want this done. We expect the cost of service to be less, because we are paying two companies now, and later on one company will do it all, and I think that the one company which will do it all will be paid a little more than it is now being paid.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It ought to be. Mr. FESS. But likely not as much as the public pays now, and with a good deal less inconvenience; but what guarantee have we that when the competition is done away with the public will not be defrauded?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The only guarantee is the guarantee that the State laws give the people. After all, the regula-tion of the local charges in the State of Ohio, where there has been more telephone trouble than in any other State in the Union, is up to the State public utilities commission and the legislature. Every right which the State has now with respect to consolidations and to regulate rates it will have after this bill is passed, but if the State felt it advisable through the legislature or the public utilities commission to authorize the consolidation of certain companies, at the present time they could not do it because of the Clayton Antitrust Act, and for that reason it seems to me to be entirely proper that in a proper case where it is presented to the Interstate Commerce Commission that we ought to be able to lift the ban so that the State may authorize this if it is desired to do so.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden] asked Mr. FESS. what control we would still retain by the Federal Government, if any. That is the thing I want to know. I believe that the current of the whole industrial world is toward concentration, and I think we have got to recognize it, but I do want to maintain control.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let me answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], which I perhaps should have done before more fully. Under the transportation act of 1920 the gentleman from Ohio will remember that the transmission of intelligence by wire or wireless was, so far as I know, for the first time brought within the letter of a Federal statute. The gentleman will find in Title IV of the amendment to the interstate commerce act, in the transportation act of 1920, the statement that one of the things that comes within the purview of that act is the transmission of intelligence by wire or wireless. That act also gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the general designation of common carrier, powers over telephone companies, and I ask the gentleman to observe the language:

The term "common carrier" as used in this act shall include all pipeline companies, telegraph, telephone, and cable companies operating by wire or wireless.

This is the situation as it will exist if this bill becomes a law. The inhibition of the antitrust acts will be lifted in certain cases, there being retained, however, in the Federal Government the right to regulate interstate commerce in telephone messages as to rates and service under the general powers granted by the transportation act. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. FESS. That answers the question.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. As I understand it, telephone companies engaged in interstate business are looked upon as public-service corporations and are under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Absolutely. Mr. McKENZIE. To fix the rates?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I notice in the bill that it is provided that after a hearing, if it is found that it would be to the advantage of the people who use these telephones, then the Interstate Commerce Commission may permit the consolidation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That language is somewhat changed.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is practically what it means. not make it compulsory and compel them to consolidate if it is for the interest of the people?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In answer to that question, let me say that a very remarkable situation exists in some of the States of the Union. The gentleman will find in the report that consolidations are compulsory in some States.

Some States provide by law that they must be consolidated, while in the State of South Dakota, for instance, and in the State of Mississippi consolidations are prohibited by law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that there will be considerable interest in this bill. I ask unanimous consent to have the time for debate extended an extra hour.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman propose in that request to have control of the entire two hours by himself?

Mr. WINSLOW. I do not care about that. Mr. BARKLEY. I find there are two or three gentlemen over here who want to speak who will not get time within the

Mr. WINSLOW. I will be very glad to yield to anybody.
Mr. BARKLEY. It is entirely agreeable if the gentleman controls the time.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman take half an hour and control it?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not care; but I want to be sure that two or three gentlemen on this side will have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. WINSLOW. It will afford me great pleasure to yield time to the gentleman right away.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time be extended one hour. there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINSLOW. I will yield 15 minutes additional to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; I will yield. Mr. CHINDBLOM. While I am never anxious to extend Government control to private business, I want to ask whether the committee had considered the question of providing that the Interstate Commerce Commission, in addition to certifying to the desirability of a consolidation might also fix terms and conditions under which that consolidation might take place?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; the committee considered it. I think I am not betraying any confidence when I say one member of the committee very earnestly argued that there ought to be a limitation, that the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to be able to place a limitation upon its act; that is, that it would lift the bar if the companies would do certain things.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Here is the trouble we got into: We discussed that quite thoroughly, and it was the judgment of the committee that if we did that we might possibly trench upon the jurisdiction of the States which we desired to keep absolute in these matters. So we thought it better to not put in language of that kind and limit the commission to either lift the bar or leave it on.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman will permit another interruption. I see the full force of that. Now, in reference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that perhaps the consolidation might result in the assumption of too much of a bonded indebtedness by the consolidating com-

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Gentlemen of the House, let me say to you that if there is anything wrong about this bill I am the first man in this House who wants to know it. I think it is a good bill and ought to be the law, but if there is anyone who has a doubt about it I hope they will state it here publicly and vigorously, that it may be fully discussed.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I had yielded to the gentlemen from Illinois.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I had begun to say that I was much impressed with the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that the consolidation might result in the assumption of too large a bonded indebtedness by the consolidating company, and for that reason it occurred to me that perhaps the bill might have provided that the consolidation might take place under conditions and terms to be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. However, such a situation might be remedied even under the terms of the bill because the Interstate Commerce Commission might refuse to certify, and it might become apparent to the parties interested that if they wanted the certification of the Interstate Commerce Commission they must comply with its terms, a different situation than that which they first presented, so perhaps the matter can be handled in that way

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will yield.

Mr. GARNER. If I understood the opening remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, this bill in no way interferes with the rights of the States to control telephone companies going into their respective States.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Absolutely.

Mr. GARNER. Now let me illustrate if I may. Let us suppose the State of Missouri, which the gentleman took for an example awhile ago, had a State commission which had control of telephone companies. It also had a law prohibiting the consolidation of telephone companies within that State. Under this act the Interstate Commerce Commission certified that it was for the benefit of the community to consolidate-

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And the State Commission of Missouri agreed that the certificate was in accord with their views. Would they have the right under this law to consolidate lines entering Missouri from some other State?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No. I am sure of that.

Mr. GARNER. That is a debatable question, and I asked my colleague from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], in whose judgment I have a great deal of confidence— Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. So have I.

Mr. GARNER. I want to be sure it is the judgment of this committee, and I wondered what to do, whether I should follow the judgment of the gentleman who drew the bill or the one in whom I have a great deal of confidence, they disagreeing on that question.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have a very high regard for the judgment of the gentleman's colleague from Texas [Mr. RAY-I think no man on our committee has a better grasp of these things, and I defer very largely to his judgment if he has that opinion, but I have in my hand the opinion of a very distinguished gentleman to the contrary, which I shall hereafter read to the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me ask the gentleman one question right in this connection. Do not the lines in any State either come from or go to some other State?

from or go to some other State?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is a very peculiar thing. They do not. There are lines in Kansas—

Mr. MADDEN. The intelligence which they convey does.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No. There are many independent telephone companies in Kansas that do not get any place outside of town. They are absolutely local. Mr. Hoch, of Kansas, will perhaps take the floor and discuss that. Mr. MADDEN. But when they consolidate that will not be

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. When they consolidate they are under the transportation act and under the Clayton Antitrust

Let me read the statement of the Attorney General, that of the bill, and I have his answer here, in which he acknowledges receipt of it, and in which he further says:

You will appreciate, of course, that it is not the province of the Department of Justice to pass upon the advisability of pending legislation. The policy to be pursued in matters of legislation belongs wholly to Congress. If, however, it is the purpose of your letter to obtain the opinion of the Department of Justice on the legal status of the bill, there is no reason why I should not give you an opinion on such a matter.

I have therefore given consideration to the provisions of the bill and beg to advise you that in my judgment it contains all proper and necessary provisions to safeguard the interests of the public in cases of consolidation, merger, or acquisition of the property or control of one telephone company by another. It leaves State legislation and control over this subject wholly unaffected, and confers upon the futerstate Commerce Commission authority to approve such consolidation or acquisition only when the same is found "to be of advantage to the persons to whom service is to be rendered and in the public interest." I should further advise you that at the present time there is no provision of law by which such consolidation or acquisition can be made by companies doing an interstate business without seeming to be in violation of the Federal antitrust laws.

Mr. GARNER. I submit to the gentleman that he does not answer the question that I put.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Perhaps I have failed to catch the meaning of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. I asked the gentleman this question. I put a hypothetical case to him, that in the State of Missouri they had a commission whose duty it was to regulate telephone exchanges; they also had upon the statute books in Missouri a statute prohibiting the consolidation of telephone companies within that State. Now, you pass this law, and the Interstate Commerce Commission certifies that it is in the interest of the public to consolidate a line running through the State or from that State into another State, and the commission of Missouri agrees that that is in the interest of the public. Can it be done?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why, if the Missouri commission agrees to it, and the Missouri commission is authorized by the laws of the State of Missouri to agree

Mr. GARNER. You are putting it differently. I ask you if it can be done?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If it is in conformity with the laws of the State of Missouri.

Mr. GARNER. I did not ask the gentleman that. Here is the State commission. You say nothing about the laws of the State. Here is the State commission created by the law. Here is a law that says whether it is in the interest of the community to consolidate a line, and the commission certifies it is but there is a statute in Missouri prohibiting lines, within the State only, of being consolidated. Would they have the right under this law to consolidate?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The question the gentlemat asks answers itself. The question he asks states absolutely bapossible conditions. Here is what he says: He says that 'he law of Missouri prohibits the consolidation, and irrespective of this law the public utilities commission of the State says hey can do it. Then the question is: Can they do it? Wh; if the laws of Missouri prohibit the consolidation, it is prohibited irrespective of what the State public utilities commission has

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman does not get my question. Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I get it clearly enough.

Mr. GARNER. I will ask for five minutes, and I taink I will demonstrate to the committee or the membership here now that the gentleman does not understand it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand Congress could enact a law permitting the consolidation of interstate telephone companies, irrespective of a State law on the subject that would specifically provide that it would nullify the act of Congress that permitted consolidation of telephone companies. This bill does not do that. It relieves the telephone companies from prosecution under the Federal statute, and to be free from any State law that does exist.

Mr. CLOUSE. The power delegated to Congress under the Constitution gives it the power to regulate interstate commerce, gives it the power to regulate the messages over telephone wires, so that the law of the State would be repealed by implication.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Interstate Commerce Commission has certain jurisdiction over telephone and telegraph messages that go back and forth between the States. That is a regulation of service and not a combination of the agencies of the service. The State of Missouri has a law which prevents even the State commission of Missouri from making such regulations. The State of Missouri can not make such an objection unless it nullifies the State laws.

Mr. CLOUSE. Now, the other point I wanted to know about is this—I am interested in this, because I have the same conditions prevailing in my section. The question I want to get clear may give some light on this. I wrote him and sent him a copy in my mind is: If Congress passes a law regulating interstate communication, would not that law of itself repeal any law of the State to the contrary?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think so.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. How could it do so? The powers of the Congress are limited by the constitutional provision. can only legislate in regard to things within our constitutional powers. The powers of the States as to local telephone business are preserved by this bill. The question as to whether they are yielded to any extent by the provision of the transportation act of 1920 is another question, and it is now being de-termined in the courts. Just how far the Interstate Commerce Commission can go in regulating the private local business of a telephone exchange that has an interstate connection is a mooted question, and is now being tested judicially. I do not believe, let me say, that the Supreme Court will ever hold that the interstate commerce powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission extend so far as to regulate local business in a local telephone exchange. As a matter of fact, the Interstate Commerce Commission itself, in the only decision it has ever rendered on this, has so held. You will observe that the distinction between telephone business and telegraph and railroad business is very wide. They do not have any apparent similarity. The only reason that the Interstate Commerce Commission has any jurisdiction at all over the telephone business is that communication between States is held to be interstate commerce

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again ex-

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Johnson].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks.

jection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I am very reluctant to oppose this bill, for the reason that as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the committee that reported the bill to the House, I am the only member opposing the bill. I always like to agree with my fellow committeemen when I can conscientiously do so, but in this case I do not feel I would be true to my constituents, and I know I would not be true to myself, unless I voiced my disapproval of this bill.

Now, what is the bill before the House? It is simply this: It nullifies the Clayton Antitrust Act in so far as it relates to telephone companies combining or acquiring the property of a competing company. It takes from the State the right to regulate and control the telephone companies. It authorizes an interstate telephone company to acquire an intrastate telephone company, thereby making both subject to the rules and regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It disguises one of its real purposes in this: It provides, before the Interstate Commerce Commission passes upon the advisability of consolidation of two or more telephone companies or the advisability of one telephone company acquiring property or securities of another, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall serve notice upon the governors of the several States and the public utility regulatory body of its intention; but whether the governor of a State or the regulatory body of the public utilities commission protests or agrees it matters not.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized to certify its findings that it would be in the interest of the public for one telephone company to be allowed to purchase the other telephone company, and the people are left without remedy to prevent it.

Why are telephone companies established? It is for the private gain of those who establish them, for public service and convenience. It is said that to do away with competition will make rates for service cheaper.

A gentleman lobbying for the passage of this bill, who claimed to be an owner of independent telephone lines, came to my office, and in discussing this bill said, although he "was anxious to have the bill passed and believed it would be for the best interest of the people to pass the bill, that the public need not expect any cheaper rates, but as the companies grew and more switchboards were put in the charges would also grow.'

So I say to you gentlemen, and especially to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess], who inquired of Mr. Graham of Illinois regarding the rates, that you need not expect any cheaper rates, for the public most assuredly will pay more instead of less.

In my State the constitution and State laws forbid the doing of the thing that is authorized by this bill.

The Bell Telephone Co. acquired the Home Telephone Co. in my State, and immediately became very autocratic, independent of the public, and unreasonable. My State has recently been subjected to some unpleasant publicity on account of the Bell Telephone Co.'s action in procuring the authorization to raise rates for telephone service, amounting almost to a

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Yes, with pleasure. Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is it not true that in the State of Mississippi both the constitution and the law forbid consoli-

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. It is.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. And the scandal brought about was because your attorney general, Mr. Collins, now a Member of Congress, prosecuted these companies, as I understand, for unlawfully consolidating and had them punished for it.

is how the scandal arose, is it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Oh, no; that might have been one of the scandals, but the one about which the people are complaining has been more recent. It has to do with the raising of the telephone rates in the State of Mississippi very recently. There were mass meetings held over the State as a protest against the raise and the circumstances surrounding the action of those who raised the rates, and the matter finally found its way into the courts of the country, where the telephone company is temporarily restrained from raising the rates.

It will not do to give one company a monopoly; it matters not if its business is transmitting intelligence by telephone or The Bell Telephone Co., as I said a few moments ago, owns the Western Union Telegraph Co., and the Western Union Telegraph Co. does 85 per cent of the telegraph business in the United States. Only last week this Congress, at the request of Secretary of State Hughes, was called upon to pass a bill to prohibit the Western Union Telegraph Co. from landing a cable at Miami, Fla., which it was undertaking to do in violation of the Government's order not to do. It was necessary for the Navy Department to send battleships to Miami to prevent this corporation from violating the order.

The telegraph companies and the telephone companies have grown to such proportions in this country that they defy the law, and you are here to-day, by this bill, taking from the people about the only protection they have against this gigantic

But, Mr. Speaker, it has only been a few months since the Republican Congress enacted what is known as the Cummins-Esch railroad bill. You robbed the people of $600,000,000 in that bill by guaranteeing 6 per cent dividends on the investments of the railroad companies. As a matter of fact, the railroad companies have received dividends on millions of dollars of watered stock, to the great detriment of the taxpaying public.

The railroad bill has already returned to damn you, and unless you Republicans who passed the bill do something for the relief of the people they are going to put you out. The rates are too high; they are oppressive; they are unreasonable. No wonder there is a business stagnation all over the whole United States, and no wonder there are millions of people out of em-

Almost every mail brings to my office protests from the farmers and shippers all over the country against the Cummins-Esch bill. They say that freight rates are so high they can not ship their products. It costs more to ship a box of lemons from the extreme western part of the United States to New York than the lemons will bring on the market. Citrus fruit shipped from Florida to some sections of the United States can not be sold for as much on the market as the freight charges. The Agricultural Department of the United States said some weeks ago that millions of bushels of grain were piled up in the West on account of the high railroad rates. The farmers and cattle raisers are protesting daily to us, urging that relief be given them; but their voice goes unheeded by the majority party that is absolutely in control of Congress.

The present bill authorizes one telephone company to buy up all the independent telephone companies in the United States, and when they do buy them up and show to the Interstate Commerce Commission that they can not operate them without a loss, every reasonable man knows that the company will be authorized to suspend the operation on the small lines, and the people will be without service.

Now, here you come with another proposition, which within a few months will see this great monopoly coming to Congress as a public-service corporation, declaring that they can not make a reasonable return on their money invested; and you who are so sympathetic with the poor, oppressed billion dollar corporations will be ready to vote a 6 per cent guaranty to them.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman from

Mr. LAYTON. In effect this bill will accomplish this: It will nullify the Clayton Antitrust Act and will allow the States to become the prey of the vast capital of that particular telephone company that wants to make a monopoly of the whole business.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. That is very true. Mr. Speaker, instead of authorizing a monopoly such as this bill will authorize, we ought to be doing something to cause the enforcement of the laws that are already on our statute books against existing trusts and combines that are new preying upon the people. I trust this bill will be defeated. [Applause.]
Mr. WINSLOW. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to authorize the consolidation of telephone companies engaged in interstate business, which is now forbidden by the Clayton Antitrust Act. It is to except telephone companies from the prohibition against consolidation contained in the Clayton Antitrust Act. That is its sole purpose. That is all that the committee believes it will accomplish.

The Clayton Antitrust Act was designed to prevent monopoly. It was to force competition. It did not recognize natural monopolies. It did not recognize existing monopolies. That act proceeded upon the theory that business interests can be compelled by law to compete. At the time that act was passed it spoke a sentiment which perhaps might reasonably have obtained in this country in 1890 or thereabouts. Perhaps at that time anyone would have been warranted in believing that competition could be forced—that monopoly might be prevented by law. Any such idea in 1921 is wholly untenable.

Any man of observation is bound to recognize that there are certain natural monopolies. There are also monopolies which exist as a matter of fact. There are monopolies which ought to exist in the interest of economy and good service in the public welfare, monopolies which must be promoted instead of being forbidden. The telephone business is one of these. Legitimate consolidation will promote economy. It will promote service. It is foolish to talk about competition in the transmission of intelligence by telephone. It is silly to believe that there can be real competition either in service or in charges.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will ask the gentleman to wait until

I have completed my statement.

If it were possible for a man who wanted to use a telephone line to look up and speak to the wire and have his message carried by that means there might be competition. But there must be a telephone in his house or office. There must be a connecbe a telephone in his house or office. There must be a connection with the main line. The main line must have terminals. It must have all the facilities for the transmission of the message

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. HUDDLESTON. I prefer not to yield until I have completed my statement. I ask not to be interrupted. Let me say here, gentlemen, that 99 per cent of the interruptions on this floor serve no useful purpose. They merely serve to divert the speaker, to cause him to digress. If he has anything to say, let him say it; interruptions never get anything out of him and do not afford anything in themselves. They are usually made to criticize some statement which the speaker makes or to confuse him or to exploit the views of the Member who interrupts. Yielding to interruptions is not a matter of courtesy at all; it is just a question of common sense. I trust that the two gentle-men who have sought to interrupt me will understand that there is nothing personal whatever in my declination to be interrupted.

Competition in the telephone business is absolutely impossible; that fact is recognized by the men who are in the business. In the hearings that were held on this bill we had some gentlemen before the subcommittee who were versed in this business. One of them was Mr. F. B. MacKinnon, of Chicago, president of the United States Independent Telephone Association, composed of practically all the independent telephone lines in the United States. I asked him a few questions, among which were the following. I said:

To what extent is there competition in the telephone business now? Mr. MacKinnon. There are about 1,000 cities in the United States now that have two exchanges.

I asked:

That does not necessarily mean competition?

He replied:

Not in all those places,

I asked:

Is there any place where you know that actual competition exists—I mean in the matter of prices or charges for the service rendered?

Inasmuch as rates are regulated by the State authorities, the competi-tion which is produced by rates and service has been entirely removed.

Mr. GRAHAM then asked:

There are some places in your State, and I know of one—my own home town—where one company has one rate and another company has another rate, both fixed by the public service commission.

Mr. MacKinnon, Yes,

I then asked:

That does not necessarily imply competition. One service may be of less value than the other.

He said:

Yes. In some cases rates are fixed upon the value of the property.

I asked:

Fixed upon the extent to which they are in a position to serve?

He said:

Yes.

I said:

I said:

I am curious to know whether there is anywhere actual competition?

Mr. Mackinnon. I do not think there is in the sense that we formerly used the expression. That matter is practically regulated by the regulatory bodies. Whereas this rule of the State commission granting a lower rate for one exchange in the same town than is granted the other exchange produces a certain amount of competition, yet we are obliged to admit that the rate is fixed by the commission based upon certain elements they are required to consider.

Representative Huddleston. At the present time we have proceeded in matters affecting public utilities on the theory that there would be and is competition. You propose now by this bill to recognize the fact that there is no possibility of competition under present economic and social conditions?

Mr. Mackinnon. That is really our theory.

Of course, there is no competition in the telephone business. There can be no competition, and we ought to recognize that fact. Consolidation means economy, and it means service. Some gentlemen object and say it will mean increased rates and poor service. I have no doubt that consolidations which have eliminated telephone competition in the past have resulted in that, but that was a fault in the regulation of the monopoly.

Now I come to what I wanted to say, and that is this: The thing that the American Congress ought to do is to recognize that certain monopolies are inevitable, and that certain monopolies now actually exist, and others will and ought to exist, and should proceed to regulate those monopolies so as to get reasonable prices and good service for the people. Let us face the future and not the past. Let us live in the present and not in a time 40 years ago; let us deal with modern conditions and not with ancient history. This bill proceeds along that line.

Now, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Johnson] is mistaken in thinking that I give this bill my unqualified approval. I do not; I think the bill ought to be amended. I think it permits the taking over of telephone properties under much too favorable conditions to the consolidating companies. I want to call attention to that phase of it.

This bill provides that-after hearings by the Interstate Commerce Commission, if the commission finds that the proposed consolidation, acquisition, or control will be of advantage to the persons to whom the service is to be rendered, and in the public interest, it shall certify to that fact and thereupon any act or acts of Congress making the proposed transaction unlawful shall not apply.

Gentlemen will note that the Interstate Commerce Commission is not authorized to attach any conditions to certification. The commission sits as a jury and its findings of fact are confined to two points only-first, that the consolidation will be of advantage to the persons to whom service is to be rendered, and, second, that it is in the public interest. Having found those facts in the affirmative, the commission is bound to certify to those facts, and the consolidation is effected-that is to say, the prohibition against it carried by the antitrust act is removed.

I mailtain that the commission should be authorized to attach conditions upon which consolidations may be effected. There are possibilities in the law which will enable the consolidated company to evade the obligations and duties of the company which it takes over and in a way that we ought not to permit. Perhaps my illustration may not be very apt, but let us assume that the company which is consolidated with another company has given a mortgage upon its property and that those securities are outstanding. Of course the security is of no value unless the concern is a going concern. If it abandons its business, if it ceases its activities, and there is no way by which their resumption can be compelled, it may simply walk off and leave its obligations and mortgage practically valueless in the hands of holders who retain merely the physical property—wires, poles, and so forth. The going concern no longer exists; its good will, established custom, and much which gave value to its securities has disappeared. A concern finding it to its interest to take that course may sell its entire stock to a competing company which may thereupon eliminate competition by simply abandoning the operations of the absorbed company and leave the mortgagee to take over the physical property and do whatever he likes with it. That is a course that ought not to be allowed. The stockholders of a concern ought not to be permitted to manipulate its property in a way to derive a benefit from it and at the same time defeat its creditors.

Let me state another case. Suppose a weak company has obtained a franchise from a city with an agreement that it shall maintain for free municipal use a number of telephones, or that it shall do some other act of benefit to the municipality. Under this bill a company desiring to absorb that company may purchase its physical property, its telephone lines and exchanges, take them over, and relieve it of its contracts because there will be no way to enforce them. They consist merely of a contract which might be called an inchoative obligation or duty, and no court could award damages for breach of such a contract as that.

There is no way by which the physical properties of the corporation can be subjected to secure it. Therefore this concern may be able to walk off, leave their obligations, and save themselves when they have made a bad trade.

Now, the remedy I would suggest for that kind of a situation is—well, I would be drastic about it. I would require the consolidated company to assume all of the duties and obligations of the company that it swallows up. If the big concern swallows the little one, it ought to take it rattles, fangs, and all, and should not be permitted to select out the more digestible parts and leave the balance for the public.

If that remedy is considered too drastic, I would suggest that at least we authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to attach such reasonable conditions to the consolidation as will protect the interests of innocent parties. Surely there should be some protection for those having an interest in these concerns who do not come within the two classes mentioned in this bill. Of course, the "public interest" is always served by consolidation. It takes away an element of doubt and uncertainty. It facilitates service, and, of course, it is always to the advantage of the users of telephones when they can get the same service over one line instead of two. Therefore in practically every case that will be brought before the commission those conditions will be complied with, and the commission will be bound to effectuate the consolidation. Abuses will creep in and astute financiers will find ways in which to benefit themselves.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman realizes that probably there will be no opportunity offered for amendment in this bill. Does the gentleman think the bill is properly safeguarded to protect the public interest in the event his suggested amendments are not adopted?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; I do not; but I consider the bill as it stands a step in the right direction. I shall not vote against the bill if it is not amended, but I think it ought to be amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Longworth). The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield me a few minutes more?

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to dwell further upon a fundamental principle to which I have already referred. American industry has proceeded through various stages of development. We had an era when competition actually existed in all lines, even in the railroad business. At that time there was honest competition and an honest effort to get business through price and service. That was the time of the small business man. It was a time when men willing to compete should have been protected and safeguarded by law and public sentiment. There was at that time no such vast aggregations of corporate wealth as make monopoly possible. Men did not have the financial strength and had not learned how to combine so as to hold an entire industry in the hands of a few. There was then no need for regulation. Regulation is never needed when there is competition, when there is no monopoly. That was the time when laws should have been passed forbidding monopolies and protecting men from unfair competition,

We have long passed that early stage in American industry, at least so far as many of the more wealthy and profitable industries are concerned. We are now in a second stage, the stage of monopolies. We are in the monopoly era, when competition is throttled by the might of wealth and combination. We are in the era of the Meat Packers' Trust, of the Steel Trust, of the Standard Oil Trust, of the Woolens Trust, of monopolies in a multitude of the things of common use, of the things which are practically necessaries of life to the Nation. In these lines of business there is no longer any competition either in price or service. The aim of these monopolists is not merely to get the most for the least return, but to grind the face of labor into the dust and to claim for themselves all that is best in our social and economic life.

These monopolies actually exist. They can not be broken up by law, because they are stronger than the law. Indeed, to destroy them would work a substantial economic harm. monopolies, as might be said, are the product of our civilization. They are the industrial form which our civilization has taken. To destroy them would be to fly in the face of conditions of gradual growth and of business ideals which are the fruit of the times. Yet we find men battling against all the tides of economic and social development, trying to force the monopolists to compete-think of it-to compete with themselves. men battle against all the elements of reason and experience, but I sympathize with them. They see the harm that unrestraised monopoly may do. They see how vast fortunes are being gathered, how profiteering flourishes, how the very lifeblood of the masses is being sucked away. They see how our ideals are being undermined. I sympathize with these men in their efforts against the monopolies, yet I realize that they are behind the times.

The Sherman Act served a useful purpose in its day, and so, no doubt, the Clayton Antitrust Act yet serves, as applied to some businesses; but in the main, laws forbidding monopolies and trusts are no longer applicable. They do not fit modern conditions. Their enforcement has become a farce. The authorities can not, indeed they dare not, enforce antitrust laws, because to actually destroy the trusts would leave a condition of economic chaos.

THOROUGHGOING REGULATION THE REMEDY.

Congress has already come to recognize that monopolies in some things can not be prevented. Witness the packers' bill, which the House is now considering. Witness railroad consolidation authorized by the Esch-Cummins Act. We are entering upon an era of regulation, an era which recognizes monopolies, because without monopolies there is no occasion for regulation. It behooves us to look present conditions squarely in the face and to see and know things as they actually are. must recognize that monopolies exist in certain great lines of industry and business, and that they ought to exist, for economic laws demand that they should exist. We should therefore proceed with courage and determination to see to it that these monopolies perform their proper functions in our economic life, that they do not oppress the people, that prices are fair, that profits are not unreasonable, and that people get what they pay for. In short, we must proceed to regulate the monopolies, to regulate them in a thoroughgoing manner, and to protect the people from their exactions.

It is foolish for us longer to dream that we live in a time of competition and, proceeding upon that theory, to legislate against men forming combinations. The combinations are already formed. The monopolies are here now. The theories of competition which our fathers held must be modified to meet modern conditions. We must accept the things that are and proceed upon a course of rigorous regulation. The sooner such a policy is adopted the sooner the people will be given relief. We must not dream on of competition while monopolists gather what little remains of our natural resources and suck away what little there is left of economic independence.

So far as many industries are concerned, steel, iron, coal, foodstuffs, clothing, oil, glass, and many other necessaries, American industry has passed through the era of competition and is now in the era of monopoly. We should deal with it as such. We must regulate monopoly by law. I do not doubt that our efforts at regulation will be stoutly resisted. Captains of industry and finance do not merely deal in commodities and securities—they deal in men. They control not merely our economic life—they mold society to their will and dominate public opinion and through it our political life. In regulating monopolies we will have to meet them not merely in enforcing the laws but in making the laws and even in the forums of justice in construing the laws. They will dodge and evade, and the best talent of the country will serve them, but the patriotism and good faith of the American people must be found sufficient to the task of mastering them.

LAST STAND TO SAVE EXISTING SYSTEM.

If we fail in our efforts to regulate monopolies and to secure justice for all with protection of the people from oppression, there remains but one other remedy. Regulation is our last stand for the existing economic system. We have found that our laws will not prevent the forming of combinations and the creation of monopolies. We must now give ourselves unreserve edly to the task of regulating them. If we fail, there is only one thing left to which resort may be made. If we can not regulate monopolies, then we must own them.

I warn the monopolists that if they desire to save our present system they must submit to regulation, to effective and thoroughgoing regulation which will leave no opportunity for rapacity and oppression. They must submit, for if we do not succeed in regulating monopolies, the only choice remaining will be between their ownership of the public and public ownership of the monopolies. I do not favor the extension of public ownership into industry if it can be avoided, but if I must take the choice between the monopolies owning the Government and the Government owning the monopolies, I shall not hesitate to accept the latter.

Will the monopolists be good? I wonder if they have got sense enough to be good. They have the strength of giants—will they use it like giants? Perhaps they can defeat regulation, but they can not stay the tide of resentment which will follow upon its defeat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, a bill of this kind naturally arouses apprehension or misapprehension on the part of men who habitually shy at the word "monopoly." I have done my share of shying at that word myself, and I have not outgrown the tendency, but there are some features about the bill now under consideration which I think need not cause any fear among those who have looked with a good deal of apprehension upon any sort of monopoly.

About 15 years ago there began a great development of independent telephone systems throughout the United States. That development was brought about by reason of discontent and dissatisfaction on the part of the people with the service which was being rendered by the so-called Bell system, and by efforts of the Bell system to act in a very tyrannical and despotic way in communities where the people had no right to a voice in the regulation of telephone facilities; so that now there are in the United States nearly twice as many independent telephone exchanges as there are Bell telephone exchanges. There are about 8,000 Bell telephone exchanges in the United States. A majority of the subscribers of the Bell Telephone Co. live in the 12 largest cities of the country.

Mr. GARNER. The Bell Telephone, as I understand it, does business in practically every State in the Union.

Mr. BARKLEY. Practically every State; yes. There are more than 15,000 independent telephone exchanges in the United States, some of them, of course, in the larger cities, but a majority of them out in the country, in rural communities and in more or less moderate-sized cities. There was a legitimate reason for the springing up of all of these independent companies 15 or 20 years ago, because the one great company undertook to ride roughshod over the people. At that time there was no regulatory power in the States to prevent the roughshod riding of the Bell Telephone Co. over the people, but during the period from 1910 to 1915, and even later, nearly every State in the Union either created a new commission or empowered a commission already existing to regulate telephone rates, so that now we have 45 or 46 States out of the 48 which have conferred upon their public-service commissions the power to regulate telephone rates just as they regulate railroad rates and other rates that are charged by public utility corporations. Not only that, but the time has come in this country when there is no more money being invested in independent telephone systems, and, practically speaking, there is no new money being invested in any kind of telephone systems anywhere in the country. The conditions which formerly existed have undergone a considerable change, because all the States except one or two have the power to regulate rates and service given to the people by the telephone companies, and the independent companies have themselves recognized that the time has come when there should be more or less consolidation. That does not mean that the Bell Telephone Co. is going to gobble up all of the independent companies. The result has been that there have been many consolidations already, but in many States independent lines have taken over the Bell Telephone lines and are giving service, which is being regulated by the public-service commissions of the States. It is the purpose of those interested in the independent lines, as stated by representatives of the independent lines, to take over the Bell Telephone companies in communities where the independent companies are better equipped to take over the l service and to give better service to the people, while in other communities where the Bell Telephone Co. is equipped to take over the independent lines they will do so, so that there will not be a universal monopoly existing all over the United States controlled by the Bell system, but there will be a unification of service in different localities, in some places the business being taken over by the Bell Co. and in others by the independent companies.

I do not construe this law to mean that there is any power whatever taken from the State commissions. I think the Congress has the power to take it away from them in so far as it regulates interstate commerce. I may not be entirely in harmony with certain old-fashioned ideas. It may be that I am trespassing perilously upon the doctrine of federalism in what I am about to say, but I believe the power of the Congress to regulate interstate commerce and the instrumentalities of interstate commerce is supreme wherever it undertakes to exercise that power.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will. Mr. GARNER. Let me illustrate, if I may, to see whether it takes away from the States any of the powers they now have. The Bell telephone system does business in nearly every State in the Union, as I understand. Suppose they desired to take over a plant in Kansas. This bill would require you to give notice to every governor in every State in the Union, hold a hearing, and if there was a single statute in any single State in the Union that prohibited the Bell Telephone Co. doing business in that State from consolidating with other companies you could not possibly consolidate, because the Bell Telephone Co. does business in every State in the Union.

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, I do not see why that fact militates against the operation of the State law whether it is favoring consolidation or prohibiting consolidation.

Mr. GARNER. I put the case in Kansas. If the Bell Telephone Co. proposed to take over the stock or the physical property of a telephone exchange in Kansas, they give notice to every governor in the United States that it proposes to do that and have a public hearing, and if any one of those State commissions refuse to give its permission, then they would not be able to accomplish that fact.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not agree with the gentleman's construction of the law at all.

Mr. GARNER. Those are the terms, and that is what I wanted to bring out.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the State of Kansas, in which the telephone lines are being taken over by the Bell company, grants its consent to a consolidation, then this law takes it out of Federal jurisdiction. If they refuse to grant its consent, then the Bell Telephone Co. can not take over the stock of the independent line in Kansas.

Mr. GARNER. Here is the point: The gentleman lives in Kentucky. The Bell Telephone Co. does business in Kentucky. It is interested in the Bell Telephone Co., and under this law it has the right to say whether or not it shall take over the Kansas concern.

Mr. BARKLEY. No—
Mr. GARNER. Yes, sir.
Mr. BARKLEY. I did not grasp the gentleman's point. I do not agree that is true. The mere fact that notice to appear is required and served upon the governor and the State commission does not give them the right to protest, so far as the law is concerned, but to come before the commission and appear at a hearing and testify as to whether it is in the interest of the subscribers and public policy that the consolidation should occur. But if the Interstate Commerce Commission, after hearing these 48 governors—who in all probability will never appear should find that the consolidation is in the interest of the subscribers and in the interest of public policy and certifies to that effect, in spite of that they could not buy stock in Kansas unless the law of Kansas and the State commission of Kansas gave consent to do so. In other words, this bill provides that there is no law upon the statutes of the United States that would prevent the consolidation wherever the Interstate Commerce Commission certifies that that consolidation is in the interest of the public and subscribers.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield to the gentleman from New York, who has been on his feet for some time.

Mr. LONDON. Is not the intention of the law that the consent of the governors should be required only so far as the corporation which is to be absorbed is concerned? In other words, if it is a corporation that is to be absorbed by the Bell Telephone Co., the law does not require the giving of notice to the governors of every State where the Bell Telephone Co. is doing business but requires the consent of the governor of the State

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

That is my construction of the law.

Mr. LONDON. That is my construction of the WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the object of the law.
Mr. GARNER, But you do not say that in the law.
Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman, I think, is putting a very strict construction on the act.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman give me some time to read what the law says?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Longworth). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. May I have some more time? Mr. WINSLOW. I can not arrange it; I am very sorry,

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I am strongly in favor of the passage of this bill, and that not merely because the initiative for it comes from Ohio. Public utilities are or should be under an entirely different set of rules from ordinary investments of capital. They are naturally monopolies. It is desirable that one consolidated organization should occupy one field. A failure to recognize that fundamental economic fact has cost this country billions of dollars.

In about the year 1880 there was the strongest movement for competing railway lines. The New York, West Shore & Buffalo Railway was projected and built from New York to Buffalo, and the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railway from No service could be performed by either of Buffalo to Chicago. those two lines which might not properly have been taken care of by railroads already existing by extending their facilities or by additional trackage. In the first case the company which already had the field met the new line with sharp competition. For a considerable time the rate from Buffalo to New York on passenger traffic was a cent a mile, and the New York, West Shore & Buffalo was practically driven into bankruptcy. other line was purchased soon after its operation commenced in order to prevent competition. The New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railway is for miles so close to the Lake Shore that you can flip a copper from one track to the other. Those who called upon the farmers to obtain the right of way said to them, will have competing lines and you can reach Cleveland or Buffalo more cheaply." What was the result? In three years the roads were under the same control and the farmer was disappointed. Two competing public utilities occupying the same field lead inevitably to one of two results-higher cost to patrons or to inefficiency.

It has been said here by the gentleman from Mississippi that such consolidation of telephone lines as is contemplated by this bill would cause higher rates. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is simply demonstrable that it will not lead to higher rates.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for

Mr. BURTON. I have very little time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Just one question. The gentleman from Texas who was here lobbying for the bill and who represented the large number of independent companies

Mr. BURTON. I heard the gentleman's statement. Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi (continuing). Came to my office and said that he would be frank with me, and stated that it would cost more.

Mr. BURTON. Let us consider that proposition a minute.

As it is now there are duplicate exchanges, duplicate conduits in which the wires are carried, a double force, a double cost to the public, not only by reason of the larger expense of maintaining two systems and providing a return upon them, but also because those who desire the largest and best facilities must have two phones. Do away with those duplicate exchanges, do away with the other duplication in the overhead, and it inevitably diminishes the cost of maintenance. And if any public utilities commission does its duty and maintains a proper harmony between the cost to the service company and the charge to the public, it must inevitably lower the rates. It is true there are some factors at work now in the way of increased cost of labor and material which may cause many to seek higher figures, but that does not interfere with the general rule.

In regard to the telephones, as I have said, you have the exchanges, each of them; they build their separate lines and put up separate poles and have separate power plants. The result is a very largely increased expense.

Now, the public have some rights in this matter. It is a very great inconvenience to the public, because patrons must have two telephones. They will be distinguished from each other. One will have a call or sound like the rattle of a rattlesnake, and the other perhaps will sound like the note of a bird. patron goes to the phone and tries to answer the one he thinks has called, or he wishes to call some person. He looks into the first telephone index and does not find the name. Then he must search through the second telephone index to find it there. If he does not find it in either, he has the idea that maybe there are three telephone companies, or he is still on the track of ascertaining where it is to be found.

I wish to impress upon the Members of the House this great general fact, that competition, at least in public utilities, has reached its limit, has been exaggerated as a creative or helpful force. Of course the strictest regulation must be had in regard to charges, in regard to service, in regard to every other feature in which the public is interested. Why, I think one of the wisest bits of legislation that has been enacted here for some time was the authorization of the consolidation of railroad systems under the Esch-Cummins Act. Whether there were some unfavorable features in the act or not, that certainly was an excellent one. Always bear in mind, I say again, that there must be regulation, and the larger the organization becomes and the greater the power it has, the more it should submit to the control of the State, because otherwise a corporation might assume so prominent a position that it might even overshadow the State itself.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I happen to live in a district that is covered by two telephone companies, and the very reverse of the gentleman's statement has been our experience. Now, in the first place, you take the Cumberland, which is a branch of the Bell Telephone Co. If this bill passes I have no doubt but that this other company will be absorbed. At present you have to put in your application months ahead, and up to recently we had to pay them $4 or $5 to put in a telephone. Before we had the competition which we have to-day in the town the service was nothing to compare with what it is to-day.

Mr. BURTON. It was not as good?

Mr. RANKIN. Absolutely not. Mr. BURTON. Then your public service commission failed, and failed most woefully in its duty.

Mr. RANKIN. It puts the town absolutely in the control of the Bell Telephone Co.

Mr. BURTON. I do not wish to impugn the State authorities anywhere, but the State authorities there were certainly lacking in their duty in that respect.

Mr. RANKIN. That is exactly the result,

Mr. BURTON. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] speaks of the danger that charges will not be controlled. This bill is an amendment to the interstate commerce act, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has full control over rates. We are creating the same rule here as that which prevails between railroads that are intrastate and interstate, and that is the natural development in the control of all public utilities.

In this connection I wish to mention a paragraph from an address by Mr. Gladstone in the House of Commons so long ago as 1844 which I came across some years ago. may be said of his views on home rule for Ireland or Egypt. or anything of that kind, Mr. Gladstone was a great financier, and his crowning distinction was in the budgets when he was chancellor of the exchequer. He was the first public man whom I recollect to call attention to the futility of the idea. that competition would help the public. The proposition was made for a parallel railroad. He said there was much capital The proposition was to invest in railways, and that naturally investors would build competing lines, but he did not think the people would be benefited thereby, and he closed with a quotation that he attributed to Mr. Fox—"Breves inimicitiae; amicitiae sempiternae," "animosities and quarrels are brief; friendships are eternal."

He maintained it was the tendency for companies to maintain sharp competition for a while, and then come to the conclusion, What is the use in all this? Either the more powerful absorbed the weaker or the two came to an understanding by which they maintained the same rates.

Let me point out-I can not do it too frequently-the difference between ordinary industrial enterprises and public utilities. As suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cockran], you might as well have two independent fire departments as two independent telephone companies. In my own State I think a very serious blunder was made. There was an electric illuminating company, and there was a proposition that a public plant be established. A smaller plant was estab-Now, if it had been provided that light should be furnished exclusively by the city, that would have been a different proposition; but what was the result? The second was a mere pin prick in the first. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. STAFFERD). The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Speaker, the discussion on this bill has drifted away from its one object. This bill was given careful consideration by the joint committee of the House and Senate. The hearings extended not only to the Bell Co. and the independent companies but, in addition, various commercial organizations were heard; and before I gave my personal indorsement to the bill I inquired from my home community, and the chamber of commerce and real estate exchanges both gave it their indorsement.

It is not my understanding that this bill takes away from a State any power that it now has to regulate telephone companies, nor does it increase that power, nor does it take from the Interstate Commerce Commission any power that it possesses, nor does it add any power to that commission.

Gentlemen who have been discussing interference with the control of the States evidently have not read the last paragraph in this bill, which says:

Nothing in this paragraph contained shall be construed as in any wise limiting or restricting the powers of the several States as now existing to control and regulate telephone companies.

As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burron] pointed out, there was a period of competition with the established company—the Bell Telephone Co. Independent companies grew up. Competition in many cases was not a success. It did not serve the community well, and the companies themselves are suffering.

There is but one object in this bill. That is to permit a telephone company to sell its property or buy the property of another company.

The matter of rates and the matter of centrel are retained in the States and the Interstate Commerce Commission now, and will be retained after this bill becomes a law. We found in our hearings that various local civic organizations were demanding this bill because the competing lines occupied much of . the street-two lines of conduits and two lines of telephone Public service with competing lines demanded that wires. each public office should have two telephones. Now, if a community desires to do away with that under this bill, they can This bill restores to the States some measure of local vernment. To-day in the State of Missouri our governor self-government. and our commission might want a consolidation of the companies. Public sentiment might be strongly behind it. Public interest might indorse it, but they are prevented by a national law from doing a thing that the people of the State may want This restores to each community local control and retains in the Interstate Commerce Commission that degree of national control which is salutary for these great corporations. We must remember, gentlemen, that interstate messages, as I understand, approximate only 15 or 20 per cent and intrastate messages, which will be controlled by our local agencies of government, make up 80 or 85 per cent. I have heard from my home city and I listened to delegations from other States, delegations of men who were not interested in these public utilities, either directly or indirectly, but they had in mind public service, and they all favored the passage of this bill.

This bill does but one thing. It permits the consolidation of telephone companies, provided the consolidation is approved by the local commissions of the States; and answering the gentleman from Texas, who inquired if a State law prohibited such consolidation could it be made under this act, I answer unhesitatingly no.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri has very clearly stated the objects and purposes of this bill. Under the provisions of the laws of the United States it is unlawful for the telephone companies to form combinations that might be monopolistic in character. This law is for the sole and avowed purpose of permitting consolidations which would be unlawful under the present law. It has no other purpose. It does not go into the realm of regulation at all. They are not compelled to come to the Interstate Commerce Commission for consolidation under this act. They merely are permitted I now existing in any State regulatory body to control or reguto come to the Interstate Commerce Commission and make an application for the consolidation, so that if the Interstate Commerce Commission considers it to the interest of the public, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall so make a finding, and then they shall not be subject to the laws of the United States respecting the preventing of monopolies.

Of course, the provisions of our laws respecting monopolies were made for the purpose of permitting competition. Everyone who has happened to have the misfortune to live in a fairly large-sized city where they have two telephone systems understands thoroughly how the disadvantages of two telephone systems outweigh the advantages of competition. I am not led to believe that we do not have any advantages by competition in the telephone service. I think we do have some advantages. There is the advantage of competition in service. If there are two competing companies each one will be more alert to give efficient service. That is some advantage. But the great disadvantage of being compelled to keep two telephone systems installed in every large office and place of business, the great disadvantage of having to do the uneconomic thing of paying the expense of maintaining two competing systems, entirely outweighs any advantage in having the competition; so that this bill simply recognizes what has been recognized by many people for a long time, that it will be beneficial to have a monopoly so far as telephone systems are concerned, in view of the fact that we have State regulatory bodies which prescribe the rates and the terms of service.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HILL. Under the present law does the Interstate Commerce Commission have any jurisdiction to fix or regulate interstate telephone rates?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The present law requires that those rates be reasonable. The transportation act does not give the same regulatory powers to the commission with respect to telephones that it does with respect to railroads.

Mr. HILL. Is it the gentleman's view that this changes that in any way

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let me supplement that. The transportation act makes telephone companies common carriers and brings them within that act so that rates can be regulated if they are unreasonable.

Mr. HILL. But it is not done by this act.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The rates can be regulated, and if an unreasonable rate is charged it can be remedied by an application to the Interstate Commerce Commission; but I meant to say that the interstate commerce act did not give the commission the power to prescribe rates and require the filing of schedules in the same manner as is required of the railroads.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But it has the power, like a public service commission, to declare an interstate rate unreasonable?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes. This does not affect the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission at all. not affect the powers of the States at all. It merely wipes out the laws with reference to monopoly whenever the commission finds that the consolidation will be of advantage to the public.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman

has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Hoch].

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Sanders] has just spoken with reference to the feature of this matter that I intended to discuss briefly. May I reemphasize what he has said? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Garner] has repeatedly referred this afternoon to the case of a consolidation involving an interstate company and an intrastate company. Now, whatever power there is at present in the States to control either an intrastate or an interstate company is retained after this bill is passed. This bill does not interfere in any particular with the jurisdiction either of the State regulatory body or of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That certainly ought to be understood by anyone upon a careful reading of this bill. Now, I do not know to what extent the State may have, as the gentleman from Texas seems to think, some power over interstate companies. There is still a twilight zone there, and the clear lines of demarcation are still to be drawn. But whatever power the States now have they retain after the passage of this bill. The terms of the bill guard that as completely as words can do it. Let me say it again, for I am surprised at the contention of some gentlemen. This bill does not take away in the slightest degree any power late any company, interstate or intrastate, either in rates, service, or otherwise. Neither does the bill extend or widen in any particular the present jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over telephone companies, State or interstate. All that this bill does is to provide that in cases where companies desire to consolidate, and the consolidated company would be an interstate company and therefore to an extent under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and when after full hearing by the Interstate Commerce Commission it appears that the consolidation would be in the public interest, the commission may make a finding which would bar prosecu-tions for violations of Federal law against consolidations. That is all this does. This does not force any consolidation, it does not compel any company, either interstate or intrastate, to sell or buy, does not interfere with the free right of consolidating or not consolidating. Nor does it waive any State laws, civil or criminal. That is the heart of this proposition. It does not change the jurisdiction, State or Federal, in any way whatever. If I thought that it did, if I thought that it gave to the Interstate Commerce Commission any power over an intrastate company which it does not now possess, I would not favor this bill. I do not think any of the illustrations given in an effort to show otherwise touch the situation at all.

There is not a line in the bill that can be construed in any way as extending the power of the Federal Government over intrastate companies. It may be true that ultimately there will be numerically more companies which are interstate companies than prior to the passage of the bill. For instance, if you have a company purely intrastate and across the State line there is another company purely intrastate, and these two companies desire to consolidate, and it is in the interest of the communities and of the service that they be permitted to do so, when they have consolidated they become an interstate company. That is true. The moment they become an interstate company they come under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government to the extent that the present law gives jurisdiction. But that effect is not brought about by this legislation; it is the result of the general power of the Federal Government over interstate companies and of the law enacted under that power. In other words it might be that by preventing their being any interstate companies at all, we might prevent the Federal Government from exercising any jurisdiction. Is there anyone here who thinks no telephone company should be permitted to do an interstate business, to be an interstate company? Of course not. And yet that is where the argument made by several gentlemen leads. The only way we can prevent jurisdiction of the Federal Government is to prevent existence of interstate business.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If they should do that now, consolidate and do business across the interstate line, they would violate the law.

Mr. HOCH. Certainly, if the consolidation was of a nature to violate the Clayton antitrust law. But this has nothing to do with the regulation of rates or the operation of the power that now exists in the States.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Suppose a company makes an application to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the commission says you are entitled to consolidate, but the State law says that they can not consolidate?

Mr. HOCH. Certainly they could not consolidate. If any valid State law prevents consolidation, they could no more consolidate after this law is passed than they could before it is passed. Read the last sentence of the bill. And I may say, as a member of the committee which conducted hearings on this proposition and reports this bill out, that local and independent telephone companies showed equal or greater interest in behalf of the measure than did the Bell Co. The measure is in the public interest. Where there are two telephone companies in a community and they both desire to consolidate and the community which bears the burden of a double system desires it, and the State law does not prevent it, why should they be prevented from consolidating by a Federal statute? This law, of course, only applies where both desire to consolidate. Under the present law if a local company wishes to purchase the local exchange of an interstate company it can not do so, even though the State commission sanctions, for fear of violating a Federal statute, There must, of course, always be rigid regulation of rates and service in the protection of the public. That is up to the State commissions to the extent of their power and to the Interstate Commerce Commission to the extent of its power. The power of neither in that regard is affected in any way by this legisla-[Applause.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Stafford). The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, strike out the following language: "It is hereby authorized to enter an order approving and authorizing the proposed transaction" and insert in lieu thereof the words "it shall certify to that effect."

The committee amendment was agreed to.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading and engrossment of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. and was read the third time.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. JONES of Texas. In its present form I am.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Jones of Texas offers a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith, with the following amendment: Add at the end of the bill the following: "Nothing in this act shall be construed as in any way affecting existing State laws nor as authorizing consolidation or acquisition in States in which the laws thereof forbid consolidation and acquisition."

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Winslow) there were 31 ayes and 68 noes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays, and pending that I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Obviously there is no quorum present.

Mr. WALSH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Mississippi having demanded the yeas and nays, and pending his demand made a point of no quorum, does he get an automatic vote on the question which is pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question will be first on ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my demand for the yeas and nays, and make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, it has been the universal ruling that where the House has divided and a Member calls for the yeas and nays, and pending that makes the point of no quorum, that it results in an automatic vote. That has been the universal custom.

Mr. WALSH. It has not been the universal custom; it has been the Texas custom.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a custom that has been followed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Johnson] had stated that he made the point of no quorum on the vote just had there would have been an automatic call, but now the gentleman withdraws his demand for the yeas and nays, and the Chair understands that he makes the point of no quorum on the vote

Mr. WALSH. How can he do that, the Chair having declared there is no quorum present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair had declared that no quorum is present, and the only thing for the House to do is to develop a quorum. The question will then be on the demand of the gentleman from Mississippi to take the vote by the yeas and nays.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair hear me for a moment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. The demand for the yeas and nays was incidental to the question pending before the House. That is, the House was dividing. The yeas and nays is a manner of divid-Whenever a quorum fails, while the House is dividing, whether it be on a viva voce vote, on tellers, or by a rising vote, the House is still dividing. That is all that the House is doing, and it occurred to me that if the House is dividing and the point of no quorum is made, that whenever the vote is taken it should be a vote upon the question upon which the House is

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the parliamentary status. The House divided on the motion to recommit. The Chair announced that the vote showed that the motion was lost. The gentleman from Mississippi thereupon demanded that the vote be taken by the yeas and nays, and pending that made the point of no quorum. The Chair desires to follow the long line of practice of the House, realizing that it is in the interest of expedition in roll calls to vote automatically on the question on which the House was dividing at the time the point of no quorum was made. The Chair therefore reverses the decision which he made a moment ago and holds that the vote will be taken automatically on the motion to recommit. The Door-keeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 97, nays 195, not voting 139, as follows:

CHANGING NAME OF GRAND RIVER TO COLORADO RIVER.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I call up House joint reso-Intion 32

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution. The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to change the name of the Grand River in Colorado and Utah to the Colorado River.

Whereas the Colorado River, which traverses or forms the boundaries of the States of Utah, Arizona, Nevada, and California, is formed by the junction of the Grand and Green Rivers, in the State of Utah; and

Whereas the Colorado River was discovered in the year 1540 and was given various names until about 1620, when it was definitely named the Rio Colorado of the West, and has ever since been known throughout the world as the Colorado River; while the two main forks of the Colorado River were not discovered until about the year 1776 and were given some 8 or 10 different names during the following 50 years, when they finally became generally known as the Grand and Green Rivers; and geren Rivers; and

Whereas the so-called Grand River is and always has been in reality and by official measurement the main stream and principal source of water supply of the said Colorado River, and historically and for every other reason should have been originally named and ever since known as the Colorado River throughout its entire length from its source in the Rocky Mountain National Park in the State of Colorado to its confluence with the Green River in Utah, and thence to its mouth in the Gulf of California; and

Whereas by the act of Congress approved February 28, 1861, providing for the organization of the Territory of Colorado, the Territory was named Colorado "for the reason that the Colorado River arose in its mountains and there was a peculiar fitness in the name," and also because "the name Colorado is more appropriate and more harmonious and is the handsomest name that could be given to any Territory or State" (Congressional Globe, Feb. 4, 1861, vol. 31, pt. 2, 36th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 729 and 766, and Hall's History of Colorado, vol. 1, p. 258); and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Colorado by unanimous vote of both the senate and house of representatives of the twenty-third general assembly has recently passed the following bill:

"A bill concerning the change of the name of the Grand River to

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, That the name of the Grand River in Colorado is hereby changed to the Colorado River, by which name said river shall hereafter be known, from its source to where it crosses the western boundary of the State of Colorado.

"Sec. 2. The change of the name of said river shall in nowise affect the rights of this State, or of any county, municipality, corporation, association, or person; and all laws, records, surveys, maps, and other public or private documents of every kind and nature in which the said river is mentioned or referred to under or by the name of the Grand River shall hereafter refer to the same river and with the same purport and effect under and by the name of the Colorado River";

Resolved, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the river heretofore known as the Grand River, from its source in the Rocky Mountain National Park in Colorado to the point where it joins the Green River in the State of Utah and forms the Colorado River, shall be known and designated on the public records as the Colorado River, shall be known and designated on the public records as the Colorado River, Sec. 2. That the change in the name of said river shall in nowise affect the rights of the State of Colorado, the State of Utah, or of any county, municipality, corporation, association, or person; and all records, surveys, maps, and public documents of the United States in which said river is mentioned or referred to under the name of the Grand River shail be held to refer to the said river under and by the name of the Colorado River.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Denison].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was introduced in the Sixty-sixth Congress by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], who is especially interested in the subject in-The gentleman from Colorado hapcluded in the resolution. pens to be ill to-day and is not able to be here, and for that reason I shall make a brief statement explaining the resolution. If he were here, he would be asked to make that statement, This resolution simply has the effect of changing the name of the Grand River, which is in the State of Colorado and partly in the State of Utah, to the Colorado River. The Colorado River is formed in the State of Utah by the junction of the Grand River and the Green River. The Grand River, which is the eastern branch, rises in the Rocky Mountain National Park in the State of Colorado, flows in a southwesterly direction, and in the eastern part of Utah it forms a junction with the Green River, which comes in from the north, and from the point of junction it is called the Colorado River. This Colorado River is an international and an interstate stream. When the gentleman from Colorado introduced the resolution in the Sixty-sixth Congress he submitted it to the Secretary of the Interior for a report as to whether or not it would meet with the approval of the Department of the Interior, and also asked the department for a report on the question as to whether or not the Congress could properly exercise this jurisdiction, or whether it should more properly be left to the action of the legislatures of the two States of Colorado and Utah, which are the two States which are immediately concerned. The Secretary of the Interior, addressing the committee by letter, stated that the bill met the approval of the department and that it was proper for the Congress to assume jurisdiction and change the name of the river, if it was desired to be done, rather than the legislatures of the two States, because the Grand River as well as the Colorado River is an interstate stream and the Federal Government has jurisdiction over it, as it has over all navigable waters of the country. I want to say that during this year the Legislature of the State of Colorado has considered a similar resolution changing the name of the Grand River to the name of the Colorado River, and the act has passed the Colorado Legislature and has been approved by the governor of that State, so that now the Grand River, or that part of the Grand River which is entirely within the State of Colorado, by the action of the State of Colorado, has been actually changed to the name of the Colorado River. But there is a distance of about 80 miles, I believe, of the Grand River which is in the State of Utah, extending from the line between the States of Utah and Colorado to the junction, which is still known as the Grand River. Now, the purpose of this resolution is to change the name of the entire branch of the Grand River to that of the Colorado River by action of the Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the purpose of the chairman of the committee is, whether he intends to move the previous question on the bill, but I wish to inquire of the gentleman who reported the bill whether he thinks it is good legislative form to incorporate into permanent law a preamble which covers more pages than the resolution itself, including the bill passed by the Legislature of Colorado?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is my intention, if the chairman does not do so, to move to strike out the preamble. When the bill which was introduced in the Sixty-sixth Congress was acted upon by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered reported out at that time the committee itself amended the bill by striking out the preamble. This time it overlooked that, and I presume the chairman intends to move to strike it out here on the floor; if he does not I shall, if he will permit me to do so. Now, the Colorado River was discovered by the early Spanish explorers, I think, in 1546, and it was known for a period of 50 years by various names. Finally it became definitely known as the Rio Colorado. They did not know its source at that time. Its source was unknown, and was unknown for a period of some 200 years after that. Finally various explorers going up into the interior discovered the river now known as the Grand River, in the State of Colorado, and also discovered the river now known as the Green River, in the State of Utah. It was not known at that time that those rivers joined together and formed what was farther down known as the Colorado River, so that one of them came to be known as the Grand River and the other as the Green River. The Grand River, it is said, is the larger of the two branches; that is, it is broader, and about 60 per cent of the water that goes to make up the Colorado River comes from the Grand River, which drains all of the western part of the State of Colorada, although the Green River is the longest. I understand that the matter has also been presented to the Legislature of the State of Utah, and at the last session of the Legislature of the State of Utah a resolution changing the name of the Grand River to that of the Colorado was referred to one of the members of the State legislature who lived in that part of the State of Utah through which the Grand River runs.

It was referred to that member for consideration and report, and while it was under consideration by him he was suddenly taken ill and died, and the legislature adjourned before any action was had on the resolution. It will now be, I think, two years before the Legislature of Utah will be again in session. So it is desirable that action be taken on this matter as soon as possible, inasmuch as Colorado has already acted on the part of the river which is entirely within that State.

The Colorado River was by the treaty with Mexico, known as the treaty of Guadaloupe-Hidalgo, I believe, recognized as an international stream, because it flows down through the Republic of Mexico, and was designated a navigable stream, and I think there is no question but that it is a navigable stream and is therefore under the jurisdiction of the Congress. And inasmuch as the people of Colorado want this name changed, largely for sentimental reasons, and inasmuch as there are no objections, so far as we have been advised, from the people of Utah or from any of the departments of the Federal Government, the committee thought we ought to grant the wishes of the people of Colorado and change the name of the Grand River to the Colorado River.

Mr. BUTLER. Everything the gentleman says is interesting, but I was wondering how we got the jurisdiction. Congress does not name the rivers. It did not name the Mississippi. shall certainly vote to change the name of the stream as the gentleman recommends, as it is all right; but I was wondering by what right we could do this.

Mr. DENISON. I will state to my friend from Pennsylvania that under the Constitution Congress has complete jurisdiction over this river, because it is an interstate navigable river. If you grant that, then it must follow that we have the right to change the name.

Mr. BUTLER. It is a navigable stream? Mr. DENISON. It is a navigable stream.

Mr. BUTLER. And runs across State lines?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; and it also is an international stream. It runs across into the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. Speaker, Congress has on one other occasion changed by law the name of one of the rivers of the country. Some time during the fifties. I think it was, the name of a river in the State of Minnesota was by act of Congress changed to the name Minnesota River. The Colorado River is one of the grandest and most beautiful rivers in the world. The scenery along the Grand Canyon and other reaches of that river is unsurpassed in grandeur anywhere in the world. The State of Colorado, one of our greatest and most scenic States, was named by Congress from that great river. Your committee thought it appropriate that the name of the Grand River, which has its source in and receives the larger part of the water supply for the Colorado River from the State of Colorado, should be changed to the Colorado River. I hope the resolution may pass.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield back the remainder of my time. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields back eight minutes of time.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], who is the author of this bill, is ill and unable to be present to-day. He has worked for a long time to secure the passage of the bill, and I should like to ask that unanimous consent be given to him to extend his remarks in the RECORD in reference to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado have permission to extend his remarks in the Record in reference to this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request on the bill that has just been passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Johnson] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the telephone bill just passed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speake

Mr. Speaker, if there is no one who cares to speak on the subject-

Mr. TINCHER. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Denison].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WINSLOW. Five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

[Mr. DENNISON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. Has the gentleman ever heard of the League of the Southwest?

Mr. DENISON. No. Mr. ARENTZ. The League of the Southwest, I may say, is an organization of the Western States which has to do with the development of the Colorado River, and while we were on the subject of the Colorado River I thought I might mention this The League of the Southwest contemplates the ultimate construction at Boulder Canyon, on the Colorado River, near Las Vegas, a 700-foot dam, which would irrigate approximately 3,000,000 acres in Arizona and Nevada, and develop sufficient power to electrify the Santa Fe and Salt Lake routes for several hundred miles, and to make Los Angeles and other points in southern California, as well as southern Nevada, an industrial center.

Well, I think there are great possibilities Mr. DENISON.

there, and I hope that will be done.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and all amendments thereto to final passage.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts withhold his motion?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.
Mr. SINNOTT. I want to know why this was introduced as a resolution and not as a bill?
Mr. WINSLOW. I do not know.
Mr. SINNOTT. I happened to look into that matter a week or so ago, and I noticed that a number of years ago in the Senate that subject had been investigated and the practice of senate that subject had been investigated and the practice of passing legislation through the instrumentality of a resolution was greatly condemned over in the Senate, as it causes a great many complications when you come to amend one of these resolutions. I thought probably the chairman had some particular reason for making it a resolution.

Mr. WINSLOW. The resolution came to the committee through Col. Taylor, and it was discussed in the committee and reported to the House in regular order.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman from Oregon will take the time to tell us what sort of measures should be headed "resolutions" and what sort should be headed "bills," we would be very glad. I have worked at that question for many moons.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes. Mr. BRIGGS. I thought the gentleman from Massachusetts was going to offer an amendment to strike out the preamble to the resolution.

Mr. WINSLOW. That is right. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that motion and will first make the motion to strike out the preamble of the resolution. I thank the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the preamble of the resolution. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINSLOW. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question on the resolution and all amendments thereto.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Winslow, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ALLEGHENY RIVER, PA.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I call from the Union Calendar the bill H. R. 5616.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the bill H. R. 5616, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5616) granting the consent of Congress to the commissioners of Venango County, their successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Allegheny River, in the State of Pennsylvania.

a bridge across the Allegheny River, in the State of Pennsylvania.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the commissioners of Venango County, Pa., and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Allegheny River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at Oil City, Pa., connecting Petroleum Street, on the south side of the river, with North Petroleum Street, on the north side of the river, in the county of Venango, in the State of Pennsylvania, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 4, after the word "county," by inserting the word "Pennsylvania."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be considered as having been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and passed.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be considered that the gentleman from Massachusetts has moved to reconsider the last vote and lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in the interest of orderly procedure, I raise an objection against that method of passing a bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas objects. The practice was established some time ago in regard to bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar not objected to. The gentleman has the right to object, and the Chair recognizes his right to ask that the House proceed under the formal rules of the House. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, did not the Chair declare the bill passed? That is a parliamentary question. Technically, has not the bill been passed? Did not the Chair declare the bill to objection it would be considered as passed.

Mr. BUTLER. That is different. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas raises an objection to a method that has long been in use in the annals of the House. But it is his right. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. Winslow, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS DES MOINES RIVER AT DUMAS, MO.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I call up bill S. 1154.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the bill S. 1154, which the Clerk will report. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1154) for the construction of a bridge across the Des Moines River at or near the city of Dumas, Mo.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., its successors and assigns, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Des Moines River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Dumas, Mo., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from Massachusetts will be considered as having moved to reconsider the last vote and to lay that motion on the table.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted-To Mr. McDuffie, for June 2, to attend United States Naval Academy graduation exercises.

To Mr. OLIVER, for June 2, to attend United States Naval Academy graduation exercises.

To Mr. LEE of Georgia, for June 2, to attend United States Naval Academy graduation exercises.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 2, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father and our God, we recognize the flight of time. Scarce do we welcome a month than we are ready to say farewell. We pray Thee that we may recognize the opportunities given to us as the days fly swiftly by. Help us to honor Thee with the best that there is in us, to the glory of Thy great name. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Over-bridge across the Des Moines River at or near the city of Dumas. Mo.

The message also announced that the House had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 5616. An act granting the consent of Congress to the commissioners of Venango County, their successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Allegheny River, in the State of Pennsylvania;

H. R. 6320. An act to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes;

H. R. 6567. An act to amend section 407 of the transportation act of 1920; and

H. J. Res. 32. Joint resolution to change the name of the Grand River in Colorade and Utah to the Colorado River.

THE JOURNAL-CONFIRMATION OF ENSIGNS.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, May 31, 1921.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the Journal.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to have the Journal read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the Journal will be read.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not care for the reading of the entire Journal, but there is one particular item, in regard to the confirmation of certain nominations in open executive session, and desire to know whether it is noted in the Journal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That part of the Journal will be

The reading clerk read the following entry in the Journal of yesterday's proceedings:

CALENDAR DAY OF JUNE 1.

CONFIRMATION OF ENSIGNS IN THE NAVY.

On motion by Mr. Poindexter, and by unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in open executive session, the nominations of Midshipmen Buell F. Brandt, Leo R. Farrell, Elisha E. Meredith, Cecil Faine, Delwyn Hyatt, Julius L. Thompson to be ensigns in the Resolved, That the Senate advise and consent to said nominations.

Resolved, That the Secretary notify the President of the United States thereof.

Mr. NORRIS. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to dispensing with the reading of the rest of the Journal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the reading of the Journal will be dispensed with and the Journal will be approved. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to say that the Journal shows that the Senate yesterday in open session, right in the presence of the whole world, confirmed six nominations. I was present when that occurred, but it was so shocking that I was rendered practically speechless at the time, and I had to have time to think about it in order to realize just what had hap-

Only a few days ago, when we were locked up in executive session, we were told that the custom of confirming nominations behind closed doors and in secret was one of the ancient cornerstones of senatorial procedure; that that custom had hair on it a hundred years old; and now here comes the Senate and with one fell swoop bobs that hair off shorter than a modern society woman's dress

It is remarkable that we should so ruthlessly set aside one of the ancient customs that are looked upon with such reverence in this Chamber. Mr. President, I am shocked. I was humiliated yesterday to think that the Senate would do it. I really thought that when we awoke this morning the senatorial ship would be sunk and that the country would be ruined. And yet here we are still alive. I wonder if we realize what a dangerous proposition we are engaged in. We have always been told that the safety of good government depends upon the secrecy of the Senate in passing upon the nominations of the President, and here, without any consideration, we have broken that ancient rule.

Mr. President, think what might occur. If we are not going to have secret sessions to pass on these nominations, how are we going to make good the promises that we make before election to give men offices for certain things they might do? I use it only as an illustration and it never has happened, of course, but it might very well happen that in a presidential campaign there might be a presidential primary in some States and, again using it only as an illustration, perhaps in North Carolina, where men were bound in a certain way and they violate their pledges and then are given positions and the hue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed Senate comes to confirm them, if we establish the precedent of without amendment the bill (S. 1154) for the construction of a considering such matters in open public session the whole country would find out all about these things. Pray God, Mr. President, what are we coming to?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that probably we owe it to the fact that the men whom we confirmed were young men and we therefore felt that they were entitled to confirmation in that way.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be.

JUDGMENT IN FAVOR OF EASTERN TRANSPORTATION CO. (S. DOC. NO. 31).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a record of the judgment rendered against the United States by the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia in favor of the Eastern Transportation Co. in the sum of $28,080.32, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

JUDGMENT IN FAVOR OF THE ARUNDEL SAND & GRAVEL CORPORATION (S. DOC. NO. 32).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a record of the judgment rendered against the United States by the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia in favor of the Arundel Sand & Gravel Corporation in the sum of $7,153.61, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution were severally read twice by title and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 5616. An act granting the consent of Congress to the commissioners of Venango County, their successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Allegheny River, in the State of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on Commerce. H. R. 6320. An act to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

H. R. 6567. An act to amend section 407 of the transportation act of 1920; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

H. J. Res. 32. Joint resolution to change the name of the Grand River in Colorado and Utah to the Colorado River; to the Committee on Commerce.

CONSOLIDATION OF TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

The bill (H. R. 6567) to amend section 407 of the transportation act of 1920 was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. POMERENE. I am authorized by the Committee on Interstate Commerce to report favorably the bill which has just been laid before the Senate and to recommend its passage.

I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 407 of the transportation act of 1920 be, and it is hereby, amended by adding thereto a new paragraph designated as paragraph (9), as follows:

"(9) Upon application of one or more telephone companies for authority to consolidate their properties or a part thereof into a single company, or for authority for one or more such companies to acquire the whole or any part of the property of another telephone company or other telephone companies or the control thereof by the purchase of securities or by lease or in any other like manner, when such consolidated company would be subject to this act, the commission shall fix a time and place for a public hearing upon such application and shall thereupon give reasonable notice in writing to the governor of each of the States in which the physical property affected, or any part thereof, is situated, and to the State public service commission or other regulatory body, if any, having jurisdiction over telephone companies, and to such other persons as it may deem advisable. After such public hearing, if the commission finds that the proposed consolidation, acquisition, or control will be of advantage to the persons to whom service is to be rendered and in the public interest, it shall certify to that effect; and thereupon any act or acts of Congress making the proposed transaction unlawful shall not apply. Nothing in this paragraph contained shall be construed as in any wise limiting or restricting the powers of the several States as now existing to control and regulate telephone companies."

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the

Whereas the loss of timber through forest fires in California and other Western States is detrimental to the public welfare and threatens the permanency of our principal manufacturing industry; and whereas the use of airplanes furnished by the War Department for patrol of forested areas in California and Oregon throughout the past season aided materially in the work of forest protection; and Whereas the Air Service has outlined a plan for air patrol of the forested areas in the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, and western Wyoming; and Whereas the States above mentioned embrace some 80,000,000 acres of Government land and centain fully one-half of all the standing merchantable timber in the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly and senate jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California memorializes the Representatives and Senators from California to use their best endeavors to secure approval of the recommendations of the Air Service for patrol of our forests by airplanes during the fire season of 1921, and also to provide the Federal Forest Service with necessary funds to enable proper cooperation with the Air Service in order that the maximum benefit be secured through such patrol; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be, and he is hereby, directed to forward copies of this resolution to the President of the Senate of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of California's Senators and Representatives in Assembly joint resolution 30, relative to the adoption of the metric system by the Congress of the United States as the legal standards of weights and measures after a transition period of 10 years, as proposed in bills now before Congress.

Whereas there is in the United States a deplorable lack of uniformity in weights and measures, and the units used are unscientific, cumbersome, and unrelated, constituting an actual hindrance to education, Industry, world trade, and the activities of daily life; and

Whereas the metric system of weights and measures is a decimal system, simple, logical, and easy to use, so that its adoption will result in an incalculable saving in time and energy; and Whereas the metric system has been adopted by the vast majority of enlightened nations, and its adoption by the United States is calculated to promote friendly relations and commerce with all the world;

whereas the State of California, by reason of its great commercial and industrial activities, is vitally interested, both as a State and in behalf of its citizens, in the speedy adoption of world-wide uniform standards of weights and measures: Now, therefore, be it

FORTY-FOURTH SESSION, Assembly Chamber, April 29, 1921.

Assembly joint resolution 31, relative to revision of the Federal transportation act of 1920 to establish a just and equitable rule of rate making.

Whereas by section 422 of the transportation act, 1920, amending the interstate commerce act by adding section 15a thereto, the Congress of the United States prescribed a rule of rate making whereby the Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix rates so that carriers as a whole will under honest, efficient, and economic management and reasonable expenditures for maintenance of ways, structures, and equipment earn an aggregate annual net railway operating income of 6 per cent upon the aggregate value of railway property held for and used in the service of transportation; and

Whereas said transportation act as now framed applies to and assures a 6 per cent income return to all railway properties, regardless of whether or not said property was reasonably acquired for, or properly applied to, transportation uses; and

Whereas such rule of rate making in effect guarantees to carriers erly applied to, transportation uses; and Whereas such rule of rate making in effect guarantees to carriers annual net earnings and removes the incentive for efficiencies in operation and economy in expenditures; and Whereas such rule of rate making imposes upon shippers and the public an excessive transportation burden, making it impossible for producers to market their products and destroying the value of producing properties, especially agricultural and horticultural lands, and has in its operation wholly failed to accomplish any beneficial results for the carriers, but on the contrary has been detrimental to the interests of producers and the public at large: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly and senate, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California at its forty-fourth session petitions the Congress of the United States to reconsider the transportation act of 1920, and urges Congress to eliminate the objectionable features herein pointed out, and to grant a rate structure that will not place a false earning power on a large fictitious railroad capital, the payment of which is stifling to industries of the Pacific coast; and be it further the conditions existing with respect to the rehabilitation of disabled ex-service men.

Whereas the United States of America has a duty, first, to furnish adequate medical, surgical, and hospital treatment to its ex-service men who need it; second, to train the disabled in as far as possible to overcome the vocational handicap that their disability imposes upon them; third, to compensate the disabled in so far as is possible by cash payments for the financial loss their disability occasions them and their dependents; and

Whereas the United States, liberal and generous in its provisions for the disabled who gave their health and strength in their country's service in the late war, has failed in a large measure, through legislative and administrative deficiencies, to make these provisions available in this, that while in the rehabilitation of a disabled man there are three needs—medical treatment, vocational training, and financial support—and while recognizing these three needs the Government has overlooked the fact that they are the simultaneous needs of one man, and not of three different men, or of one man at three different times, and has given the problem over to three agencies—the Public Health Service, for treatment; the Federal Board of Vocational Education, for training; the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, for financial support—each agency an institution complete in itself and each administratively independent of the other two, and all by force of circumstances exercising functions they were not intended to exercise; and Whereas, as a result, there has been unintentional administrative chaos, duplication, wasted energy, and conflict which has resulted in thousands of disabled were in need of hospitalization, unable to secure treatment on account of lack of adequate hospital facilities, and an unusual amount of hardship and inability to secure treatment by thousands of disabled men in need of hospitalization, unable to secure treatment on account of lack of adequate hospital facilities, and an unusual amo [SEAL.] Secretary of State.

Mr. KELLOGG presented a resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, as follows:

concurrent resolution memorializing Congress of the United States to nullify certain orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission affecting intrastate railroad rates and to amend the act to regulate commerce so as to render such orders in the future impossible.

Whereas in the so-called Esch-Pomerene bill to amend the act to regulate commerce it was provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission should have authority to make such orders as might in its judgment tend to remove any undue burden upon interstate or foreign commerce; and

Whereas there was widespread apprehension, both in Congress and with the public generally, that the inclusion of such a provision would almost, if not critically, eliminate State control of intrastate railroad rates, for the renson that the commission might decide that any intrastate rates upon a lower basis than corresponding interstate rates would constitute such undue burden; and

Whereas after much debate upon the question, both in committee and upon the floor of the House of Representatives, it was decided that such objectionable provision should be, and the same was, stricken out of the bill; and
Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission has, since the passage of the transportation act, 1920, interpreted section 13 (4) of the act to regulate commerce to confer upon it the same power over intrastate rates which it was feared would result had said undue-burden clause been included; and, purporting to act under the authority of said section, the commission has already made orders purporting to change entire systems of intrastate rates in the States of New York, Illinois, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, and has many similar proceedings now pending before it; and
Whereas the reasons given by the commission for the orders in question would apply wherever intrastate rates are upon a lower basis than the corresponding interstate rates, so that under its interpretation of said section 13(4) the legislatures of the several States have been deprived of substantially all power to regulate intrastate rates; and
Whereas the construction placed upon said section is not only in contravention of the tenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States but is directly contrary to the will of Congress as evidenced by its action when it removed said undue-burden clause from the Esch-Pomerene bill: Wherefore it is **Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota (the Senate concurring). That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully and earnestly petitioned to take such action as will nullify the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission hereinabove mentioned and to so amend the act to regulate commerce as to render such orders impossible in the future.

ENFORCEMENT OF PROHIBITION.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a petition of the Southern Baptist convention, held in Chattanooga, Tenn., May 16, praying for a more rigid enforcement of the present laws on prohibition.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"The Southern Baptist convention, composed of over 5,000 messengers, representing a constituency of more than 3,000,000 white Baptists, in convention assembled at Chattanooga, Tenn., May 16, 1921, memorialize the United States Government to wipe out 'moonshining' and 'bootlegging' in the United States of America. The illegal manufacture and sale of 'white lightning' decrease the efficiency and available supply of labor, impairs health, and even kills, lowers morals, leads to violation of law and the destruction of life and property. whether this can be done unless the penalty is made more drastic and prison sentence made mandatory instead of being left optional with the judge."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES,

Mr. STANLEY, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill (S. 1838) to amend section 4887 of the Revised Statutes relating to patents, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1804) to protect the interest of innocent third persons in property which is used in the unlawful conveyance of goods or commodities, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 88) thereon.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1855) to save daylight in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 89) thereon.

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1033) regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 90) thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. Jones of Washington, the Committee of Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, was discharged from their further consideration and they were thereupon referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

S. 574. A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States," amended; and

S. 1887. A bill to protect interstate commerce in foods, drugs, and medicines, and to extend the provisions of the food and drugs act of June 30, 1906.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows

By Mr. KELLOGG (by request):

A bill (S. 1943) providing for the better protection of aliens and for the enforcement of their treaty rights; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. WARREN: A bill (S. 1944) incorporating the Lighthouses for the Blind; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WILLIS:

A bill (S. 1945) to reimburse the Navajo Timber Co. of Delaware for a deposit made to cover the purchase of timber (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 1946) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of Federal reserve banks, to furnish an elastic currency, to afford means of rediscounting commercial paper, to establish a more effective supervision of banking in the United States, and for other purposes," approved December 23, 1913; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. SHORTRIDGE:

A bill (S. 1947) to provide for the disposition of revenues from national parks, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 1948) to regulate the conducting of business in the District of Columbia on Sunday; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. CAMERON:

A bill (S. 1949) to permit adjustment of conflicting claims to certain lands in Mohave County, Ariz.; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 1950) to enlarge the area of lands authorized to be taken for the reclamation of the Anacostia River Flats; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. GLASS:

A bill (S. 1951) for the relief of John Hickson, jr. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims. By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 1952) to appoint Col. W. P. Richardson, United States Army, retired, to the grade of brigadier general on the retired list; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 66) to repeal that part of the act of Congress approved February 28, 1920, which provides for the sale of Camp Eustis, Va.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMISSARY PRIVILEGES TO CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1023) permitting certain employees of the Government to purchase supplies from the commissary stores of the Army and Navy, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PHIPPS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows

On page 34, line 19, after the word "sell" insert the following: "or to dispose of by transfer to the Department of Agriculture under existing laws, for its own use and the use of the several States, in road work and maintenance of roads."

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. KING. I submit a resolution which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 83) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board be, and is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate the following full and complete information upon the following matters, to wit:

1. Amount of money advanced to companies or individuals operating allocated chine.

Amount of money advanced to companies or individuals operating allocated ships.
 The compensation paid companies or individuals operating allocated ships.
 The total amounts received and disbursed by such companies and individuals operating allocated ships.
 The number of allocated ships operated by the Shipping Board in competition with those purchased from the board by private companies.

4. The number of allocated ships operated by the Shipping Board in competition with those purchased from the board by private companies.

5. Names of all persons or corporations to whom ships have been allocated, and the number of ships allocated to such persons and corporations, respectively.

6. The number of ships chartered to persons or corporations, and if none have been chartered the reasons why ships have not been chartered as required by law.

7. The number of ships sold, together with the amounts received from the sale thereof, and also the number of contracts for the sale of ships outstanding, with the status of each; the number of ships placed in the hands of receivers, and the reason therefor; also the cost to the Government in operating said ships while in the hands of the receivers, together with the cost of the receiverships; the amounts paid for counsel and attorney fees in receivership proceedings, and to whom said amounts were paid; also whether liabilities have been incurred for counsel or attorney fees in said receiver or other proceedings of the Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Fleet Corporation for which liability attaches to either the Shipping Board or said corporation.

8. The amount received from the United States by the Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Fleet Corporation.

S. The amount received from the United States by the Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Fleet Corporation.

9. The amount received by the Shipping Board or said corporation from the sale of ships, material, and all other forms of property dis-from the sale of ships, material, and all other forms of property disposed of.

10. The total amount received by said corporation from all sources, the kind, character, and value of property on hand and owned by said corporation and said Shipping Board.

11. The liabilities, actual or contingent, of said Shipping Board or said corporation, and the nature and cause of such liabilities.

12. The number of agencies established in countries other than the United States, and the number of offices maintained in said countries, with the number of employees therein.

DANISH STEAMSHIP "FLYNDERBORG."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 997. I presume there will be no discussion on the bill, and if there shall be, I will withdraw it. The bill passed at the last session of the Senate, but was not passed by the other House. I think there is no opposition to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The title of the bill for which the Senator from South Carolina asks consideration will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary. A bill (S. 997) conferring jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the Eastern District of South Carolina to hear and determine the claim of the owners of the Danish steamship Flynderborg against the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to know what is the object of the bill for which the Senator from South Carolina asks consideration.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire briefly to explain the bill.

Mr. KING. I desire to object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me before he makes objection to the consideration of the bill, I desire to make a statement as to its object.

Mr. KING. I withhold the objection.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the bill covers a case for damages growing out of a collision between a Government ship and the Danish ship named. There is now no method by which in this country the owners of the Danish vessel may go into court in order to secure compensation for such damages as they may have sustained. In somewhat similar instances bills have been presented to Congress and passed after having been reported upon by the Committee on Claims, allowing such claims. This This bill permits the claimants to go into the Court of Claims and have their case adjudicated upon the principles of admiralty Under such procedure the basis of compensation is entirely different from that which governs the actions of Congress. In admiralty law, if both vessels in collision are at fault, the damages are apportioned. Ordinarily in the case of a claim for damages reported favorably by the Committee on Claims we allow the entire claim and can give no consideration to the question whether or not the damages ought to be apportioned. bill simply proposes to allow the claimants to go into the Court of Claims. While litigants may go into the Court of Claims in all actions growing out of contracts, either express or implied, in actions of tort no one can sue the United States in the Court of Claims.

I desire further to say to the Senator from Utah that the method here proposed is more equitable, more just to the United States, and protects the United States better than to allow compensation under a bill reported from the Committee on Claims, as has sometimes been the practice in the past.

Mr. KING. Is not the Senator from Minnesota in error in stating that this bill proposes to give jurisdiction to the Court of Claims? My understanding of the measure, as I heard the title read, was that it proposes to give jurisdiction to the district court in South Carolina.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is correct. It is proposed to confer on the district court in South Carolina jurisdiction of I said "Court of Claims" inadvertently.

Mr. KING. If I understand the bill, I have no objection to the matter being submitted to the Court of Claims; but I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that if we permit the United States to be sued at any place in the United States, or in every place in the United States, pretty soon we shall be dragging the officials of the Government around and they will be compelled, for the purpose of defending the Government, to go into every part of the United States, and take the archives and the records of the Government with them. The cost of such procedure would be enormous, and the inconvenience to the Government, of course, must be obvious to the Senator from Minnesota and to everyone else.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if my good friend will allow me, he refers to a bill that is pending here to amend the law giving jurisdiction to the district courts in the case of claims against the Government exceeding $10,000. Under the present law the district courts have jurisdiction of all such cases not exceeding $10,000 in amount. If they involve more than $10,000, the claimant must go into the Court of Claims. The bill to which I refer has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary and is now on the calendar. It proposes to increase the jurisdiction of the district courts to cases involving not exceeding $50,000.

Mr. KING. I am familiar with the bill to which the Senator refers, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. NELSON. That bill relates to cases growing out of con-In respect to this case, it is an action of marine tort, and the bill simply confers jurisdiction on the district court of the United States in the district of South Carolina, where the tort occurred, and where the evidence is at hand. In all other civilized maritime countries there is a method by which, when such accidents occur, the admiralty may immediately settle the case and pay the damages, if any there be. We had one case in this country some years ago, however, in which a collision occurred and damage resulted to a foreign ship where eight years expired before those suffering from the collision obtained compensation, a thing which never could occur under any other Government.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I desire to ask what is the present order of business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order of business is concurrent or other resolutions.

Mr. NELSON. A request has been made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] for unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill on which I have been speaking.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There has been such a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. NELSON. I trust the Senator from Wyoming will not object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. The Senate has a prescribed method of procedure, and I prefer that that method be pursued.

I regret very much to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DIAL. I withdraw the request for the consideration of the bill, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming call for the regular order?

Mr. DIAL. I merely desire to repeat that the bill for which I have asked consideration passed the Senate at the last session. I do not desire, however, to take up the time of the Senate now in a discussion in reference to the bill, and I withdraw my request for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill named by the Senator from South

Mr. KING. I have objected to the consideration of the bill. but the request for its consideration has been withdrawn by the Senator from South Carolina.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 74, being the bill (S. 1837) to amend section 32 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act. This is the bill I explained the other day as being an emergency matter, recommended by the Farm Loan Board and by the Secretary of the Treasury consideration of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill may be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 32 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act, be amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 32. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, upon the request of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to make deposits for the temporary use of any Federal land bank, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Such Federal land bank shall issue to the Secretary of the Treasury a certificate of indebtedness for any such deposit, bearing a rate of interest not exceeding by more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by the last bond issue of the bank receiving such deposit, to be secured by farm loan bonds or other collateral, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Any such certificate shall be redeemed and paid by such land bank at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The aggregate of all sums so deposited by the Secretary of the Treasury shall not exceed the sum of $50,000,000 at any one time."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am not quite clear just what the bill really means. Will the Senator make an explanation of it?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, this bill is an emergency measure asked for by the Farm Loan Board and by the Secretary of the Treasury. Under existing law the amount of money that can be used for this purpose is limited to $6,000,000. It has been impossible for the farm loan banks, with a limit of $6,000,000, to secure enough loans to use as a basis for a bond issue. They say that the use of $50,000,000 will enable them to accumulate a sufficient number of farm mortgages to use as a basis for a bond issue.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator from Kansas advise me whether under the bill the farm land banks can pay a higher rate of interest than that provided by present law?

Mr. CURTIS. They can not. The bill provides that the Federal land bank shall pay interest on the Government deposit "not exceeding by more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by the last bond issue of the bank receiving such deposit."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill now. I simply wish to say what the result of the bill will be. When the Federal farm loan act was passed section 32 of the act provided for a revolving fund of $6,000,000. This bill increases that revolving fund to $50,-000,000. Again, it provides:

Such Federal land banks shall issue to the Secretary of the Treasury a certificate of indebtedness for any such deposit, bearing a rate of interest not exceeding by more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by the last bond issue of the banks receiving such deposit.

I think, if this bill becomes a law, that the Federal land banks will come to Congress in a very little while and ask that the rate of interest be increased, because the rate of one-half of 1 per cent is not sufficient to pay the expenses of doing business. I have no doubt that that will be the next step if this bill becomes a law.

Again, Mr. President, this is an increase of the capital of the bank. We thought, of course, at the time, they having a right to issue bonds and sell them on the market at 5 per cent, that the Government of the United States certainly would not have to furnish more than $6,000,000 capital. This simply means that $44,000,000 more of the Government's money will be used as capital for those banks. This may be, perhaps, just as good a way to advance that additional amount of money as any other suggested plan that has come before the Senate.

I had hoped that the Federal land bank would go on and run under the existing law. If the Federal land bank can not sell bonds exempt from all taxation at a rate of interest of 5 per cent, I hardly think it is worth while now to undertake to increase the capital stock of the bank with the avowed purpose of allowing the one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. GLASS. At a rate of 51 per cent, I will say to the The law was recently amended so as to permit that.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; as the Senator suggests, even at 51 per cent.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Farm Loan Board are now selling their bonds and have sold about $36,000,000 of the $40,-000,000 authorized. They state in a letter to me that they are not able to issue any more bonds because they have not the collateral in the shape of mortgages to put behind such an issue, and that is what they want this additional money to be used The Government will lose no money whatever. It is simply a loan, or an advance, in the discretion of the Secretary, to the Federal land banks, and is bound to come back. security is the very best; and if there is a class of people on earth needing relief now it is the farmers of this country. They have suffered more in the last two years, perhaps, than any other class in the country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want everything done within reason to assist the farmer; there is not any doubt about that; but this bill, if it becomes a law, is not going to be amended in the future. It is to be on the statute books, in my opinion, without any change for years and years to come, with the exception of an increase of interest rate. I do not want to go into the result of this legislation and what has been made under the 5 per cent rate, and now we are authorizing 51 per cent. I recognize, however, that the Congress is going to do something to assist the farmers, and I do not know how many more bills will come before the Senate for this purpose; and if any bill is to pass. I think myself that the pending one is the best one of I think, however, that when this bill is passed the other bills that have been reported will also be passed, and I do not know just where the end is going to be. As I say, I am not going to object now to the consideration of this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present

consideration of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have no objection at all. I think it ought to pass. I want to say, with reference to the remarks of the Senator from Utah, that one reason why this situation was brought about, the cause of this situation, the litigation that was instituted attacking the constitutionality of the farm loan act, and thereby suspending the operations of the Farm Loan Board for practically 18 months. reason why they have not got the mortgages to which the Senator from Kansas refers to offer at this time. I think myself that the board ought to have gone on receiving applications for loans and passing on loans and getting ready for the time when the act was sustained by the courts; but that would have been a chance. Suppose the act had been declared unconstitutional? Then all their work would have gone for naught.

Mr. SMOOT. Even before the Supreme Court decided that the act was constitutional, I think the Federal Farm Loan Board had passed upon loans to the amount of $67,000,000, and approved the same. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if that is not the fact?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think all those that have been approved have been closed.

Mr. GLASS. There are accumulated loans that have been examined and approved in the aggregate to the amount of

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I am quite sure of it. I was positive that I was not wrong.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no doubt about that; and they have not the money to meet them.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, this is not going to do not. We authorized them to sell bonds for that purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. SMOOT. And there is no doubt but that they can sell those bonds. Now, I do not like to pass a bill with any camouflage about it. I know what the object of the bill is, and the Senators ought to know, and let us have no mistaken idea of trying to make an excuse that is not really the reason for its passage. I think myself that the bill will give the board a wider latitude, and perhaps for the present it needs it. Therefore, as I say, I am not going to object.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah about another bill which in a way is a companion piece to this bill. The Banking and Currency Committee has reported out a bill to increase the interest rate of bonds issued under the Federal farm loan act to 51 per cent and providing that no higher rate shall be charged the farmer. I should like to ask the Senator if he will have any objection to taking up that bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that when that bill comes up for consideration it simply means this: The joint-stock land banks are the father of the bill. It is not the Federal Farm Loan Board at all. The joint-stock land banks now come here and tell Congress that if we will increase the rate of interest on their bonds up to 51 instead of 5 per cent, they will do the business for one-half of 1 per cent. Mr. President, the object of the legislation is for these joint-stock land banks to get established more firmly in the different parts of the country, thinking by doing so that Senators and Congressmen will cease their efforts to repeal the privilege the joint-stock land banks now enjoy of issuing bonds exempt from all forms of taxation.

Mr. KENYON. If the bonds are to be floated and the system made a success at all, it can not be done with a 5 per cent bond in competition with all the tax-exempt bonds in the United States. It is a question of destroying the system or of so increasing the rates that they can operate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the Federal Farm Loan Board can sell their 5 per cent bonds to-day.

Mr. KENYON. They are having a very hard time to do it. Mr. SMOOT. Capt. Smith did not tell me that the other day when I was talking to him about the sale.

Mr. KENYON. It has taken an intensive campaign, arranged long beforehand, to do it.

Mr. SMOOT. The bonds at 5 per cent will sell if any bond will.

Mr. KENYON. I think the people who are back of it are trying to do something for the agricultural situation in the country. I think that is the real motive. It may be that when there was 1 per cent to do business on they could make money; but they can not do it on the one-half of 1 per cent, and the farmers will pay no more.

Mr. SMOOT. No; and they will be back here asking that the interest be increased one-half of 1 per cent, so as to make the interest to be collected from the farmers 61 per cent-

Mr. KENYON. We may be past the financial difficulty that exists now when they do ask for any such thing, but that is borrowing trouble before we get to it. We are in trouble now. Let us try to get out.

Mr. SMOOT. But I think they can get out of it without the passage of the other bill.

Mr. KENYON. Without the passage of the bill providing for an increase of one-half of 1 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; absolutely. I want to say to the Senator that the Federal Farm Loan Board never brought that idea to Congress.

Mr. KENYON. The Federal Farm Loan Board is not opposing it, nor is the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, why should they, as far as that is concerned?

Mr. KENYON. I do not see why anyone should in the present situation of the farmer.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the only reason why I opposed it was that we might just as well take both steps at once, because we have got to take them in the end. The joint-stock land banks in the West have guaranteed in several cases to loan money at a discount of 2½ per cent to certain institutions if they would start the joint-stock land banks. Gentlemen interested in joint-stock land banks went into my State and offered to start two of such banks and guaranteed that the loans would be discounted 21 per cent, and the Federal board said they could not do it under the law, and prevented it.

Mr. KENYON. They will not make any money.

Mr. SMOOT. They can not do it at one-half of 1 per cent, and they only want to get such banks established in numbers so that the Congress of the United States will never take the exemption privilege away from them.

Mr KENYON. Ordinarily, of course, a person would think that; but I know certain men who are interested in joint-stock land banks whose only interest now is not to make any money but to help poor farmers out of the financial difficulties in which they are. I know that. I know some of these men.
Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may think that is the case—

Mr. KENYON. I know it.

Mr. SMOOT. I think myself that if I were going into any business I should like to go into a joint-stock land bank, if I knew the exemption privilege would continue, and that I, as an individual stockholder, should have the privilege of issuing bonds exempt from all forms of taxation—city, county, State, school, and National taxes of all kinds. Why, it is a privilege that never ought to be granted to any other agency than the Government of the United States; and I want to make the prediction that unless before many years elapse the tax-exempt privilege is repealed as far as the joint-stock land banks are concerned, the Federal farm-loan banks will play second fiddle to the joint-stock land banks. They will either dominate the money market for the farmers or the Federal loan banks will.

Mr. KENYON. If you are going to repeal the tax-exemption privilege as to anything, why not repeal it as to all, and have a constitutional amendment to stop it as far as the States are concerned? Let us not begin now on the things that particularly affect agriculture. I think the day is coming when we will have to get rid of these tax-exempt securities. Mr. SMOOT. I think we ought to begin on those exemptions enjoyed by private individuals.

Mr. KENYON. Let us not begin where it affects the class of people in this country who are suffering more than any other because of the stringency of the times.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think they are suffering any more than many of the other industries of the country.

Mr. KENYON. There is not an industry in the country that is suffering as the agricultural industry is.

Mr. SMOOT. I can name them by the dozen.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator can name them, but-

Mr. SMOOT. I know it. There is not any question about it. Mr. KENYON. I do not want to interfere with the passage of the Senator's bill. I think it is a good bill, and I will stop the discussion so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let us pass the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I note from the RECORD that action on this measure was postponed on day before yesterday, and there was given as a reason the fact that I was not in the Chamber, the implication being that I would object. I do not intend to object, because the responsibility is not mine. assume that the reason of the postponement was my wellknown aversion to legislation that carries unusual and special privileges, as this bill does, undoubtedly. In fact it is unprecedented. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to loan public funds, raised by taxation from the people, to banks, upon no other security than the bank's note, its certificate of indebtedness, something that was never done before in the history of the banking business of the country.

Nor am I able to agree that there is an emergency. lieve that the farm loan bonds, totally exempt from all taxation, are perhaps the best security in the country. They can easily be sold if the effort is made to sell them, and they have recently been sold in the aggregate of almost $40,000,000. those bonds can not be put on the market under the circumstances, I shall despair of the ultimate success of the farm loan banking system.

But I am not going to object to the immediate consideration of the bill, because the responsibility is not mine.

Mr. SMOOT. It simply means that it is virtually call money at 5 per cent interest, because they can sell the bonds at any time at present and within a few years at a premium.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether there is any limitation upon the amount of money which may be extracted from the Treasury of the United States by the terms of the bill?

Mr. CURTIS. There is. They are now authorized to use $6,000,000, and under the bill they may use, if they have the proper loans to put in, up to $50,000,000.

Mr. KING. Is it a revolving fund?

Mr. CURTIS. No; the revolving fund plan was turned down, and this was recommended in its place. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and all the members of the Farm Loan Board.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Kansas says they are authorized to use the money if the leans can be made. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit the money in the banks and the banks do not give any security at all, just as the Senator from Virginia said. They simply take the obligation of the bank, Mr. President, and the bank then is supposed to make the loans.

Mr. CURTIS. The farm loan banks of course have the mortgages as security, and the limitation placed upon the lury." Whenever he calls for it it must be paid.

amount which may be loaned on any one farm makes the loan absolutely secure, as was well said by the Senator from Alabama the other day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD Mr. President, as I understand this bill, the language might be construed to mean that we shall first advance the money and get the bends afterwards; but I think that is technical. I do not see any difference, in my construction of the bill, between it and what was done within the last two months, when the Government of the United States advanced its credit to the extent of a hundred million dollars for these farm loan bonds in order to relieve the distressed condition in the agricultural communities.

It may be said that we are going a long way when we are allowing the Federal credit to be used in private endeavor. But, Mr. President, this has ceased to be a private concern. The Government of the United States has organized a farm loan board, and under that board it has authorized the establishment of farm loan banks. They are Government controlled banks, carrying out a Government purpose, and there is no question about the security they take. I have heard no man, in Congress or out of it, question the validity of the securities which are taken by these banks.

Right now the agricultural interests of America are greatly distressed. Many proposals have been made to relieve the situation. Some of those proposals I consider to be wild and unsound, and I have not been able to support them; but when it comes to the proposal to do what we did a few months ago, to do what is contemplated by our own law, to enable the agricultural interests of America to obtain loans with cheap money, to improve the agricultural conditions, it seems to me that now is the most opportune time to relieve the distressed agricultural conditions, if we can do so in this way.

As far as I am able to observe, I do not think the Government of the United States stands in danger of losing a penny. Every dollar that may be advanced now will be returned as soon as the country reacts from the present panic condition, for we might as well recognize what we are facing. The country is practically in a panic to-day. This panic is not going to last forever, and as soon as the country reacts from panic conditions, there is no questions but that there will be ample market for the sale by the Government of these bonds they are taking over now, and the money will go back into the Treasury without loss to anyone. So it seems to me that this is a conservative handling of a distressed condition.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I am not going to be put in the attitude of hostility to this measure, but I think we ought to keep the RECORD correct. The Senator from Alabama, in my belief, is totally mistaken in saying that we have ever done this before.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to assure the Senator that I know where he and I differ in our viewpoints on this matter. I know the Senator's viewpoint as to what we are doing is not mine, but to my mind I do not see the difference. I know the Senator does, but I see no difference.

Mr. GLASS. I believe there is a very great difference. What we did a few months ago was to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to buy outright not less than $200,000,000 worth of farm loan bonds, and the only justification on earth for that action was that the Government itself had paralyzed the farm loan system for a period of more than 14 months by the failure of the Supreme Court of the United States to decide the litigation before it. So the activities of the entire system all over the country had been terminated, and we authorized the Government, because of its dereliction, to buy outright a certain amount of farm loan bonds. There is not any case on record, and no one can cite a case where we have embodied, as a permanent part of the statutes of the country, an authorization to the Secretary of the Treasury to lend the public funds to a bank upon evidence of indebtedness.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all there is to it.
Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether this act expires by limitation when it serves what he conceives to be an emergency?

Mr. CURTIS. The act authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion, upon the request of the Farm Loan Board, to make deposits for the temporary use of any Federal land bank in an aggregate of all sums so deposited not to exceed The existing law limits the amount to six millions, which does not enable the board to secure enough mortgages for a basis of a bond issue. The limitation is on the dollars and-

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator will recall that the bill provides that "any such certificate shall be redeemed and paid by such land bank at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treas-

Mr. CURTIS. And in addition to the provision referred to by the Senator from Florida, the issuance of them is also in his discretion.

Mr. President, the condition of the agriculturists of the United States is such as to command the sympathy of all. They have sustained great losses as the result of the rapid decline in prices of farm products. Unquestionably this decline brought agricultural products to levels far below the cost of production, and entailed heavy losses upon agriculturists in nearly, if not every, part of our country.

Other industries have likewise suffered. In the West most of the mines have been closed and thousands of employees are without employment. They are traveling from State to State seeking work, but are unable to obtain it. Many corporations and individuals engaged in mining operations have sustained serious losses, and many have been brought to the verge of bankruptcy. The situation of the mining industry is most serious, indeed.

The cattle and sheep men have sustained stupendous losses, and many of them have been forced into bankruptcy. manufacturing interests in the United States have not escaped disasters, and millions of laboring men are now without em-This situation is most serious, and reveals an industrial condition almost without parallel. Our resources are inexhaustible and our wealth, real and potential, is greater than any nation in the world. Our circulating medium is larger than ever before, and the nations of the world are eager to purchase our surplus products, both manufactured and raw.

It is not my purpose to analyze the causes producing the economic collapse which has come to our Nation, or to point out what I believe to be suitable and proper remedies in order that we may obtain amelioration from present financial and economic ills.

I shall not oppose the pending bill. Indeed, under all the circumstances I shall vote for it. I do so, however, with deep apprehension and with a conviction more or less settled of its inutility, and its danger, because it will be regarded as a precedent for measures which will, if adopted, produce evil consequences

Legislators can not, when called upon to support proposed measures, look only at the present. Opportunism unfortunately too often accompanies legislation. We are prone to seize upon any plan which promises temporary and immediate relief from dangers or adverse financial conditions. We seek to isolate our acts from the future and affect to believe that they will become encysted and thus be wholly unrelated to the industrial, political, or economic life and conditions of the future. The truth, however, is that the present is largely the parent of the future, and present legislative acts will be dissolubly connected with the future.

Legislation enacted in war times unfortunately is appealed to in support of measures sought to be enacted in peace times. Many people protested against war-time legislation and insisted upon the immediate return to peace conditions. Indeed, one of the issues in the last campaign grew out of the fact that certain war-time legislation was not promptly repealed by the party in power when the armistice was signed. And yet many who clamored for the repeal of such legislation and denounced the party then in power because of its maintaining in peace time legislation enacted during the war are not only resisting the repeal of such as still exist upon the statute books but are seeking the reproduction of measures which were enacted during the war and could only be justified because of war condi-

It requires time to emerge from the atmosphere of war and to appreciate the fact that this is a Government of law and that there are limitations upon the Federal Government. During war times the Government exercises great power and its authority is almost absolute. We get into the habit of looking to it for all things, and when peace comes it is difficult to break away from such habits. A spirit of dependence has been developed, and the Government is often called upon to assume paternal control and exercise paternalistic authority and by legislative fiat dissipate economic and industrial ills. We must learn the lesson sooner or later that prosperity, progress, and freedom do not come from governments; they spring from the people themselves. A larger spirit of independence and self-reliance must be developed. Salvation is from the people, not from the Government.

There have been too many economic fallacies projected in the past and their advocates are legion to-day.

A large number of American people clamored for years for the unlimited issue of greenbacks, or other forms of paper money. There was a belief that the printing press could cure our financial ills, that if hundreds of millions of dollars of irredeemable paper money were put into circulation prosperity would come. There are too many demands now being made upon the Government, and its authority is invoked where the Constitution is silent or contains prohibitions, and efforts are made to draw it into fields of activity where it has no authority to enter.

This legislation, I am afraid, will be regarded as a precedent for future demands to supply credit, and indeed funds, when any industry is jeopardized or any section or class is threatened with financial reverses or possible ruin. It will be contended that if the Government may supply money to meet agricultural demands it should supply credit or funds to all other industries or classes where industrial paralysis exists or is threatened, or serious financial troubles are imminent. Many even now regard the Treasury of the United States as a perennial fountain to which all may come for financial relief.

In European nations demands are being made for credits, and also for paper issues by the Governments, and in many instances, where these demands have been acceded to, the further inflation of the currency has resulted and the credits ex-tended have been the basis of still further inflations, thus producing greater evils and contributing in a marked degree to the suffering and financial disorders already existing.

As stated, the agricultural situation is so serious as to warrant the Government pressing to the limit its constitutional authority. I sincerely hope that this measure may be productive of good, and that my apprehensions that it may be regarded as a precedent for unsound and dangerous legislation may prove to be unfounded.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I can not agree with my friend that this is going to prove a dangerous precedent. We would not do this promiscuously, but in years gone by we have constantly been depositing Federal funds in banks here in the East and in the large financial centers, and much of it was deposited, in years gone by, without any interest at all.

Six or seven years ago the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr.

McAdoo, deposited our fund. in the western banks to help the moving of the crop. This is simply going to help temporarily the financing of the farmers of the country. There can not be any question about the securities, it seems to me. that these farm-loan bonds were a choice investment prior to the time when the Government rather preempted the money market, and now we are borrowing large sums of money on temporary certificates at 53 per cent, I am told. But the time will soon come, I dare say, when the money market will be improved, and these bonds will be sold, and the farmers will in that way be helped. I regard this only as a temporary expedient, and I believe it is a wise measure to pass.

Mr. GLASS. Of course, the Senator from Ohio knows that under existing law the Secretary of the Treasury is abundantly authorized to deposit other millions of dollars to-day in western banks, the only difference being that those banks would be required to furnish United States bonds as security for the loans.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas for the present consideration of the

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1837) to amend section 32 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 32 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act, be amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 32. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, upon the request of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to make deposits for the temporary use of any Federal land bank, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Such Federal land bank shall issue to the Secretary of the Treasury a certificate of indebtedness for any such deposit, bearing a rate of interest not exceeding by more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by the last bond issue of the bank receiving such deposit, to be secured by farm-loan bonds or other collateral, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Any such certificate shall be redeemed and paid by such land bank at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury shall not exceed the sum of $50,000,000 at any one time."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES KILLED OR INJURED ABROAD.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment

I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to say that the morning hour expired a little prematurely, before I got the typewritten copy of the report which I desire to submit.

From the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1911) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, and I submit a report (No. 91) thereon.

The bill is simply this:

A number of Federal employees during the war served with the Expeditionary Forces of the Government. Under the compensation act passed some years ago by Congress employees who suffer injuries in the Federal service are entitled to compensation, to be fixed by the Compensation Commission. The powers of that commission are broad enough, in my judgment and in the judgment of those with whom I have consulted, to take care of employees who were injured in serving with the Expeditionary Forces in the war, but the limitation of the law required that minor injuries should be reported within 60 days. and death within a year, and as these men were serving abroad necessarily the time expired before they could bring the matter to the attention of the commission. The bill merely amends section 20 of the compensation act by allowing the men, within the discretion of the commission, the right to file their claims within a year.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the bill also provide that if the disability or death was the result of injury sustained in the period of the Great War and arising out of conditions due to the war, the commission may do certain things? Does not that take in a new class of claims for injury?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not so advised by the commission. The present law is broad enough to cover the situation. However, if it is not, when a man may fall in an elevator in the Capitol at Washington and break his leg or break his neck and be able to present his claim to the Compensation Commission, but if he is serving his country in the front line and falls into an enemy shell hole and gets killed, to say that a claim can not be presented to the commission, it seems to me, is a very strange position for any great government to take.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the Senator knows that an appropriation bill has precedence over any other bill that is called up. However, if the Senator thinks his bill can be passed without consuming very much time, I do not wish to interfere.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it can not, I shall not press it. Senator's deficiency appropriation bill is not in order until the morning hour has expired.

Mr. WARREN. Nor is the bill of the Senator from Alabama. Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know; but it is usual until the morning hour has expired to permit morning business to go on until 2 o'clock

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator thinks he can conclude without consuming too much time, I will yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Any clerk in the service during the war, if he went out and got on a drunk and received disability or death, could then be taken care of under the provisions of the bill just the same as a soldier.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; that is not true.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know why it is not true. It is provided here:

If the disability or death was the result of injuries sustained in the period of the Great War, and arising out of conditions due to the war, the commission may for any reasonable cause shown allow original claims to be made at any time within one year after the passage of

That means that in the past they have had 60 days' time to make these claims, while under the provisions of the bill they would have one year after its passage.

In other words, anyone who has received a disability or death from any cause arising out of the conditions due to the war shall have the same privileges as one who was in the war and received his disability in line of duty.

In considering pension bills we have always been very careful to provide that injuries should have been received actually in line of duty. The Senator will remember one bill considered by the Senate; the bill passed the Senate, however, when I was out of the Chamber. It was a case where there were two officers who were on a drunken spree over in Virginia and ran into a tree and were killed. The Senate actually passed a bill providing a pension for the dependents of those two officers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not interrupting the Senator now, because I presume, of course, he will allow me to have an opportunity to correct him after this statement he has made. have studied the proposition and the Senator has not, but I do not wish to interrupt him in his statement. I merely desire the privilege of stating the facts when he gets through,

Mr. SMOOT. Then I ask that the bill may go over until I do get further facts, if I have not enough now. I certainly object at this time unless amendments are agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Utah objects to the present consideration of the

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask that it may go to the calendar, but I ask recognition, because I wish to discuss the question. I do not wish the RECORD to go out in the condition it is in now. I do not like to interfere with the desire of the Senator from Wyoming to proceed with the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, but I do feel that I would be doing this case an injustice if I did not speak about it at this time.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator to yield to allow me to call up the deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; I have no objection to the Senator calling the bill up.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6300, the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the reason why I am going to delay the Senate now is that I can not afford to allow the statement of the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] to go out in the RECORD uncontradicted. I know the mental attitude of the Senator from Utah in reference to claims against the Government for injuries in the Great War. I am not critical of the Senator's position, because he is entitled to it. I know that it is not one particular case that affects the Senator, but that he is earnestly and honestly trying to do what he considers his duty to take care of the Treasury of the United States. He imagines if the door is opened to the payment of claims of civilian employees who served on the Expeditionary Forces during the Great War that it is going to make a great burden on the Treasury of the United States, and therefore he stands in the way of them.

I realize the stress of the Government. I do not think the financial condition of the Government of the United States has at any time in its history been any more serious than it is today. I recognize that. I stand with the desire of the Senator from Utah to protect the Treasury, and, as far as I can, legitimately and honestly and fairly, I propose to do so. are some matters that rise beyond the question of dollars and cents. There are some obligations that the American people have to meet first, that have to be paid first and recognized first if we propose to continue as a Government that lives up to the high ideals which we have inherited from the past.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize exactly what the Senator has said, and I fully agree with him, but I think in a case of that kind there ought to be a special bill for the party and he ought to be paid in the same way that we have paid pensions under special bills in the past.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know the Senator thinks that way and I am going to refer to it before I get through this morning. I do not propose to let this measure be choked to death. The Senate of the United States has got to do what is just by the men who gave their lives for their country, who were behind the firing line, even if they were not in a soldier's uniform. It is going to do what is just or vote it down, or it is going to hear from me repeatedly on the subject.

I am aware of the Senator's suggestion that in individual cases we may bring in a special pension bill to pay the civil employees who lost their lives or sacrificed their health in the Great War. I know in that way, where there is sufficient political influence behind the claim, sufficient energy shown in the pushing of it, that some men may get justice or something that approximates justice. But if we adopt that plan we will find that one man with great political influence will probably be paid a very large sum of money, and the next man with a lack of political influence will be paid a very small sum of money or get nothing at all. That is not abstract justice. That was the condition that confronted the Government of the United States for many years in reference to injuries happening to civil employees, and the Senator from Utah knows it. One of the reasons why the Senator himself supported the employees compensation bill was because under that law it fixed a regular compensation for every class of injury and provided for a tribunal that could reconcile its judgment and pass on each case of an injured employee. Congress passed the bill.

The Government of the United States has abandoned the old theory that the Senator from Utah now wishes to invoke that in each case of injury the applicant should come here on bended knee asking as a supplicant for his rights to be compensated for the injuries that he suffered during the war. I think the first great obligation that this Government owes to anyone and to everyone is to take care of the wounded and disabled soldiers in the Great War and pay their wives and children a fair compensation where they have died.

I am not here advecating money to be paid to well men, to men who can take care of themselves. The men who lost their lives and their limbs in defense of their country are entitled to consideration, and although there are Senators here who for the purpose of protecting the Treasury of the United States against the consideration of legitimate claims against it, desire to draw a distinction between the man who served in uniform as a soldier and the man who rendered equally necessary and efficient service as a civilian employee serving with the Expeditionary Forces abroad, I can not see the distinction.

If my son served with the front-line troops in the face of the enemy and was injured and your son served with the postal employees in identically the same location at the front line and a shell explodes and injures both, I do not see where the distinction can be drawn between the man who is serving in uniform and the man who is serving by his side as a civilian employee, a volunteer who went at the call of his Government to render service that had to be rendered and which was just as necessary as the service of the soldier which had to be performed.

Mr. President, some time ago I introduced a bill proposing to amend the war risk insurance act in order to enable injured civilian employees to initiate claims; not to pay them, not to give them any money, but merely to give them a chance to go before a tribunal of the Government and establish a righteous claim if they had one. As soon as the matter came before the Senate the leaders of the Republican Party stood here in solid phalanx combating the proposition. I finally got the bill to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and there it is today, no action having been taken upon it. The Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] was one of those who stood here insisting that such civilian employees of the Government should have no claim which the Government had a right to respect; that payment for such injuries would endanger the Treasury of the United States.

Then, Mr. President, I went into the question further. We have a law upon the statute books providing compensation for employees of the United States suffering from injuries received whilst in the performance of their duties. I thought that if under the present statute we could not relieve the situation, could not relieve the suffering of women and children whose husbands and fathers have died on the front line, legislation looking to that end should be enacted. I know of a case where a civilian employee with the Expeditionary Forces in Siberia was under fire as much as were the troops themselves, where he lost his life serving with the troops, although he only bore a civil commission from the Post Office Department. His wife and child are in absolute distress. There are hundreds of other cases of that kind. That man gave his life in the service of his country. I repeat, we have a law on the statute books which provides compensation for employees of the United States suffering from injuries incurred whilst in the performance of their duties.

It is a good law, a proper law, and a law with exact limitations. I introduced an amendment to that law proposing to amend it in only one particular. I did not introduce that amendment until I had consulted the Compensation Commission having charge of such matters, and I was advised by that commission that in cases of the kind referred to employees of the Federal Government serving with the Expeditionary Forces were entitled to compensation for injuries suffered whilst in the performance of their duty just as if they had received their injuries while serving at home, but that the law required such a claim to be made within 60 days for a minor injury, and within a year in the event of death; and that compensation in such cases had not been allowed because the claims had not been filed within the prescribed time.

The Republican Party, through its leaders, proposes to stand here and block this proposition. I would not say that if this were the first attempt that had been made along this line. The Senate knows that I have been pursuing this matter for months and that every time the effort has been made the block has been interposed. If that policy is continued, I propose that this matter shall hang around the neck of the Republican Party until justice is done. There is not any use of trying to avoid this proposition. Senators on the other side have got to take the responsibility or they have got to vote on the matter.

How can we expect a man in France or Siberia, who received injury in one of those far-off countries, who may have been carried to a hospital, was practically unknown, to file within 60 days back here in the United States notice of his injury? If he were killed his family might have notice of the fact that he had died, but how could they go to Siberia or to France in order to ascertain the cause of his death or whether it had happened under circumstances which brought the case within the terms of the act?

I have been advised that the only thing that stands in the way of affording this proposed relief is the fact that the time for giving notice in these cases has expired. All I am proposing to do is to extend the time and to give these people an additional year within which they may file notice of their claims. I have not proposed otherwise to amend the law.

Senators say it is all right for a man who operates an elevator in the Capitol if it falls with him and breaks his leg or break his neck to come before the compensation commission and get $66 a month. That is the aggregate that he can get.

Mr. SMOOT. He would get one year's pay under the law.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is not advised about the law. I have studied the law and I had advice from the commission. I know the Senator assumes he knows what the law is, but I have a letter which may give him some information and which I will read to the Senator before I get through, because I intend to occupy some time in connection with this matter now and in the future.

I was saying that if a civil employee is operating an elevator and the elevator falls and breaks his leg or breaks his neck the law provides—and the Senator from Utah supported and advocated the law—that that man shall have an opportunity, not to come here as a suppliant to the Congress but, as a matter of right, to go before the United States Compensation Commission and to have redress, to have his case determined, and, if he has a proper and just cause, he or his family shall receive compensation for the injury. Now, forsooth, in the case of some men who were asked to serve as civilian employees with the Army abroad the Senator from Utah thinks it is his conscientious duty to stand here as a block. If a man breaks his neck on an elevator at home, he can be paid by the Government of the United States, but if a German shell were to blow a civilian employee out of existence because he dared face the firing line abroad, the Government of the United States owes that man no duty; he is a part of the waste of war.

I do not say that the Senator has intentionally misinterpreted the amendment to the law which I have proposed, but he undoubtedly misinterpreted it in his statement this morning; and I do not propose to allow that misinterpretation to stand in the RECORD without being corrected.

Mr. President, I have a copy of the text of the compensation act as passed by the Congress. The first section of that act reads as follows:

That the United States shall pay compensation as hereinafter specified for the disability or death of an employee resulting from a personal injury sustained while in the performance of his duty, but no compensation shall be paid if the injury or death is caused by the willful misconduct of the employee or by the employee's intention to bring about the injury or death of himself or of another, or if intoxication of the injured employee is the proximate cause of the injury or death.

That is the first clause of the employees' compensation act: and yet the Senator from Utah this morning, within the hour, has likened the cases to which I have referred to the case cited by him of two Army officers who went out and got drunk, ran into a tree, and were killed—putting these men who were heroes, if men's personal actions can make them heroes, on the plane of drunken men.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not put them on that plane.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what the Senator's illustration did.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply said that could happen:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am showing the Senator now that it can not happen. The law expressly says that it shall not happen. That is the law that I am amending, and the only amendment I make to it is to add, at the end of section 20 of the law, the following. I had better read the whole paragraph and then what is added to it.

Mr. GLASS. What page is it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Page 5, section 20. It reads as follows: That all original claims for compensation for disability shall be made within 60 days after the injury. All original claims for compensation for death shall be made within one year after the death. For any reasonable cause shown the commission may allow original claims for compensation for disability to be made at any time within one year.

In other words, as the law now stands it gives a year for filing all claims. It gives the right to file minor claims within 60 days and claims for death within a year; but for reasonable cause shown the commission is allowed to permit the filing of any of these claims within a year. At the end of that paragraph the bill which I have introduced and have reported to the Senate this morning adds the following:

If the disability or death was the result of an injury sustained during the period of the Great War and arising out of conditions due to the war, the commission may for any reasonable cause shown allow original claims to be made at any time within one year after the passage of this act.

And yet the Senator from Utah seeks to have the country think that that amends the basis of the claim! I do not wish to stress the Senator's conclusion too greatly, because I realize that he was only reading this clause for the first time and probably had not had a chance to analyze it, but to say that a clause in a bill specifying the cases in which the time of limitation can be extended amounts to an amendment of the governing clauses of this law is so absurd that it is hard to see how a man can reach such a conclusion.

The Senator's objection to this bill is that he says that in it I am attempting to broaden the law so that these claims will have to be paid to any man who served with the Expeditionary Forces abroad or in this country. I think the Senator is right, that it extends the statute of limitations to those abroad or in this country, and rightly so.

There should be no discrimination in the matter; but it is only the statute of limitations that is being extended. It is simply an absurd proposition to say that this amendment fixes a different status for filing a claim. The paragraph is about the limitations of time within which a claim must be filed. The time has expired for these boys who served their country abroad, who served with the armies. Those who served with the armies here on the continental soil of the United States, I have no doubt, where they have claims, have already filed them, but what I am trying to relieve is the statute of limitations against the filing of claims by men serving on the front

Now, listen to this again, remembering that section 20 is about the limitation of time within which a claim must be filed. Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator limit his bill to men on the firing line?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to limit it to the men who served with the Expeditionary Forces abroad.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have no objection at all to the bill if it applies to a man on the front who was really injured by the explosion of a shell, or by dropping into a shell hole while on duty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is proper to have the bill read as it is, and apply to those here or abroad; but if the Senator is willing to withdraw his objection and let this justice be done this morning, I am willing to amend it so that it will read "with the Expeditionary Forces abroad."

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I am perfectly willing to do that; but it does seem to me that where a clerk goes over to France and spends his time in Paris, as many of them did, never got outside of the city, and never took a chance any more than a clerk took a chance in this country, if he received a little injury I do not think he ought to be treated in any different way than a clerk that sits in a swivel chair here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He will not be. I am not seekin do that. That is just what I am telling the Senator. I am not seeking to Senator has not got the attitude of this matter.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will let this bill go over, I will go over the matter with him carefully, and I think we can agree to an amendment that I will not object to at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I have to fight this thing through, I am going to fight. If the Senator is willing to let it go through this morning, if he wants to limit it to men who were in the foreign service, I am willing to limit it and let the bill go through; but if I have got to go to the calendar and fight, I am going to fight and keep on fighting.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the Senator doing that, of course. That is his right. Now, I am going to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All right.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator really think that those clerks who were in Paris, and never went outside of Paris, ought to have any consideration shown them in the amendment offered by the Senator, and does he not think that they would have?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If they come within the first section of the law, they would have a year in which to file their claims.

That is all they would have.

Mr. SMOOT. A year after the passage of this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what they would have, a year after the passage of this bill. The first section of this compensation act says:

That the United States shall pay compensation as hereinafter specified for the disability or death of an employee resulting from a personal injury sustained while in the performance of his duty, but no compensation shall be paid if the injury or death is caused by the willful misconduct of the employee or by the employee's intention to bring about the injury or death of himself or of another, or if intoxication of the injured employee is the proximate cause of the injury or death.

That is the law in reference to the man in the swivel chair in this Capital, and there is no reason why it should not be the law in reference to a man in a swivel chair in Paris; and, as a matter of fact, these accidents did not happen to the men in the swivel chairs in Paris. There might be an exceptional case, of Mr. SMOOT. There may be cases of that kind.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, well, there may; but it is absurd to stop the cases of hundreds of men who really received injuries on the front line under the fire of the enemy's guns because some man in a swivel chair in Paris might have fallen out of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, does the Senator say there were hundreds of them?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I suppose there may be, I do not know of more than probably 100 myself.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In what capacity were they serving, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I got my information about this, as to the capacity in which they served, from the United States Compensation Commission. They say that among the services that may be affected by this amendment are the civil employees engaged in the Army transportation service-

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, too.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is true. If the Senator objects to those men who were on the firing line in the transportation service coming within the scope of this act—

Mr. SMOOT. I do not object. I think it is proper and right that those engaged in the transportation service should be taken care of.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They go on to say that it may include the construction work of the Army Quatermaster's Department abroad, railway construction, postal employees, and civilians attached to hospitals and camps serving with the Armies of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have every one of them put in the bill and specifically mentioned, and I should not object to it a moment—not a single one of them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I am advised that this amendment will reach. The Senator, though, sought to point out this morning-

Mr. SMOOT. One other thing before the Senator leaves this subject. The only reason why I referred to the two officers being killed by running into a tree on a drunken spree was the very fact that the law was against such a thing, and yet the Senate passed a bill covering it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was because we passed a private The Senator this morning advised us to pass private bills in this case, and said that if we did we would pass bills of that kind to take care of drunken men, like the Senate did before but what I am advocating is that we shall pass a general bill putting everybody on the same footing, and doing justice to all.

Mr. SMOOT. So am I, to make everybody equal; but in my opinion this would not do it. Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why not?

Mr. SMOOT. For instance, you can amend the bill so as to take in the very classes that the commission recommend, and those are the only classes that the Senator desires to cover.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are the only classes that I have in mind, I am free to say; but I want the Senator to understand that I am not trying to amend the workmen's compensation act of the Government of the United States except in a single particular, and that is to extend the statute of limitations that prevents their filing their claims. I am not trying to I am not trying to give the family of a man who lost broaden it. his life behind the front lines from an enemy shell any more than you are willing to give the family of a man who lost his life because an elevator fell in the Capitol. I am not asking anything more; but these men who did give their lives on the front line are entitled to that much, and you are denying it.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know whether or not they carried insurance?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If they carried insurance, it was their private fortune. They were not allowed to carry Government insurance under the war risk insurance act.

Mr. SMOOT. Why not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because they did not come within the terms of it. As the Senator knows, I tried to get a bill through here some time ago to bring them within the terms of the act, and the Senator was one that objected to it.

Mr. SMOOT. That was because of the fact that they had not carried the insurance, not because of the fact that they could not have carried the insurance.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But these men were not within the terms of the act and could not carry insurance. Of course, they may have had private insurance; I do not know about that. Most of them probably did not. Some of them perhaps did; but if so, it was under their personal contracts.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely. Nobody would object to that at all. I had reference entirely to the Government insurance under the war risk act.

Mr. President, as far as I am personally concerned, the only thing I had in mind in objecting to this provision was that it would affect a large number, and also would apply to the clerks who served only in the United States. I have no objection to it if that class is excepted; and if the Senator does not think there are very many who will be involved I shall not object to his amendment if it is restricted to those who served abroad.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am perfectly willing to amend it so that it shall include only men serving abroad. I do not like to restrict it to the particular class the commission has set out, because we might do a very grave injustice to somebody we may have left out

Mr. SMOOT. I can not think of any; but, of course, there may be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The beneficiaries would be few in number, and why should we not do it?

Mr. SMOOT. Really, the recommendation of the commission as correct. Nobody could object to that.

was correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, if the Senator is willing to accept this amendment, I again ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up and passed. I am willing that the bill should be amended so as to read:

If the disability or death was the result of an injury sustained during the period of the Great War, and arising out of conditions due to the war, by employees serving with the Army of the United States on foreign soil, the commission may for any reasonable cause—

And so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Why should the bill be limited to persons serving on foreign soil? Why should not a man who was injured while working in an American camp be compensated?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would prefer to leave it as it is, but the men who were serving here on American soil had their rights under the act. They were at home, and they had their 60 days to make claim for injury, and there was a year in which claims for their deaths might be filed.

Mr. SMOOT. And they all knew it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Whereas the men who were on foreign soil were absolutely deprived of any opportunity.

Mr. SMOOT. I think there is a great difference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am perfectly willing to suggest this amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill with an amendment as follows, after the word "claims," on page 2, line 4, that there be inserted the words "of certain employees of the Expeditionary Forces of the United States serving outside of the territory of the United

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, of course, objection having been made, the bill went back to the calendar. Now the Senator wishes to call it up again from the calendar for further consideration while the deficiency bill is under consideration.

will not object if it does not lead to further debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Bursum in the chair). The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent to have taken up for immediate consideration Senate bill 1911. Is there objection? There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 1911) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I move the amendment which I suggested a few moments ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Reading Clerk. The Senator from Alabama proposes to amend, on page 2, line 4, by inserting after the word "claims" the words "of certain employees of the Expenditonary Forces of the United States serving outside of the territory of the United States," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, be amended as follows:

"Sec. 20. That all original claims for compensation for disability shall be made within 60 days after the injury. All original claims for compensation for death shall be made within one year after the death. For any reasonable cause shown the commission may allow original claims for compensation for disability to be made at any time within one year. If the disability or death was the result of an injury sustained during the period of the Great War, and arising out of conditions due to the war, the commission may for any reasonable cause shown allow original claims of certain employees of the Expeditionary Forces of the United States serving outside of the territory of the United States to be made at any time within one year after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6300) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I may be detained from the Senate on official business a little later this afternoon, when we reach the appropriation asked for the Shipping Board, and if the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge does not object, I should like to make a few observations now upon that phase of the bill, which will save any discussion of it later by me if I should happen to be here when we reach it.

Mr. WARREN. Under ordinary circumstances I should ask that we proceed to take the bill up and read it through for action on the committee amendments, but I wish to accommodate the Senator, and I will not object to his speaking at this time on the matter to which he refers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not make any motion in regard to this matter, either now or later, but I shall object to the appropriation of any amount whatever for the Shipping Board until certain information has been furnished. I want to indulge in a short discussion of the Shipping Board, however, and of some of its delinquencies and its activities.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator proceeds, may I ask him if he still has objection to the appropriation of $10,000 for the Bureau of Efficiency?

Mr. KING. No; I have investigated that item and I have no objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator allow it to be agreed to now?

I have no objection. Mr. KING.

Mr. WARREN. In that same connection, there were one or two other amendments which went over until to-day. I presume the Senator would not object to the allowance for a motor vehicle for the War Department and certain other small matters

Mr. KING. I think that is a very bad practice. I think those vehicles ought to be sold, and if these organizations are entitled to vehicles, let them purchase them.

Mr. WARREN. We are not able to bring that about. secured the passage of a law looking to that end, but it was immediately repealed by the passage of a bill reported from another committee. I do not know whether the Senator from Utah was one of those who voted to repeal it or not.

Mr. KING. No; I was not. Mr. WARREN. These are minor matters, and they are of such a class that the sales will amount to very little.

Mr. KING. I have read substantially all of the testimony taken by the House committee, and every word of the testimony taken before the Senate committee, and, calling attention to one item, the one for $5,000 for the Alien Property Custodian, I am opposed to that absolutely. The testimony showed that the only purpose of having an automobile under that office is to bring the Alien Property Custodian down to his business in the morning

Mr. WARREN. These amendments which the Senator asked to have go over until to-day relate to only small matters, and as he said he was going to be away, I thought we might go back to them.

Mr. KING. I think when I am absent from the Chamber the Senator will be able to get through these amendments without any difficulty.

Mr. WARREN. I am inclined to help the Senator all I

Mr. SMOOT. I did not want to take advantage of the Senator, and that is why I brought up the Bureau of Efficiency amendment

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that he can start with the $4,000,000,000 we have already put into the Shipping Board, by direct appropriation, and then add all the money they have made by the sale of ships.

Mr. KING. I am going into that in a few moments.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the Senator has no objection to agreeing to the appropriation of $10,000 for the Bureau of Efficiency, as set out on page 2.

Mr. KING. It may be agreed to, as far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment referred to.

The READING CLIMK. On page 2, lines 15 to 18, inclusive, the committee proposes to insert the following paragraph:

BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY.

To enable the Bureau of Efficiency to perform the duties imposed upon it by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, during the morning hour I offered a resolution which was read and is now upon the table to be called up at any time. It directs the Shipping Board to report to the Senate concerning a number of matters relating to the activities of the board. It particularly asks for information as to the amount of money advanced to companies operating allocated ships, the compensation paid to such companies, the receipts from such companies, and the amount paid to them by the Shipping Board to cover the losses resulting from the operation of Government-owned ships. The resolution also asks information concerning the number of ships sold, together with the amounts received from the sale of the same, the number of ships now in the hands of the receivers, the amount received from the sale of materials and other property disposed of by the Shipping Board, the total amount of property on hand and owned by the Emergency Fleet Corporation and by the Shipping Board, and the liabilities, contingent and otherwise, of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation. My purpose, Mr. President, in offering the resolution is to obtain full information concerning the work of the Shipping Board, the reason for the losses resulting from its labors, and the manner in which it is discharging the important responsibilities resting upon it. My information is that the corporation is as wasteful and inefficient now as in the past; that its methods of conducting business are as archaic and as unsatisfactory as during the rush and congestion of the war.

After considerable investigation I am convinced that the billions spent by the Government have been and will be largely dissipated and that out of the tremendous expenditures there can be realized but an inconsiderable sum.

We have not completed, nor do we have, an adequate mer-The vessels owned by the Government are, in chant marine. the main, inferior and not capable because of the types, imperfect construction, faulty machinery, and so forth, of competing with modern and properly built and economically constructed ships for ocean commerce. I appreciate that the needs of the Nation during the war were such as to call for the most feverish haste in ship construction and that waste and extravagance were inevitable. Shipyards sprang into being overnight and incompetent men were charged with responsibilities for which they were unfit. Shipbuilders were needed and our country was lacking in the technical skill required for economical and We labored under many disadvantages proper shipbuilding. and must be ready to accept material losses and to regard them as a part of the war expenditures.

War produces waste. The cannon and guns produced at enormous cost are soon cast into the scrap heap, and vessels imperatively needed for the transportation of troops and supplies, built under conditions that forbade economies and efficiency and the proper standard of workmanship, as well as design, could not even approximate in worth and value those which are built under normal conditions. We know that the prices of materials of every kind, as well as the wages paid to those engaged in ship construction, reached unparalleled heights, and contributed to the huge total which the Government was compelled to pay for the ships which are now controlled by the Shipping Board.

But after taking into account all these factors which minimize any charges which might be made and extenuate in every possible way, the record of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation is not one of which we can be proud, and, indeed, in my opinion, is such as to call for severe criticism. Here and there are bright spots in this record, but in the main but little can be said by way of praise and much is justified by way of condemnation.

At this point I desire to speak in high terms of praise of the work of Judge Payne, who for a short time held an important place with the Shipping Board. He found chaos and confusion worse confounded and an orgy of reckless waste and extravagance. He addressed himself with courage, and ability of the highest order, to a rectification of the awful conditions existing, and sought to rescue the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation from the pit into which it had fallen. It was most unfortunate for the country that Judge Payne was called from this great work to which he had so resolutely dedicated himself. As Senators know, he succeeded the late Franklin K. Lane as Secretary of the Interior, and in that important department of the Government he rendered most conspicuous and valuable service.

It was thought that after the armistice the Shipping Board, relieved from the pressure and tension which war operations produced, would extricate itself from the frightful situation in which incompetency and haste and extravagance had placed it, and that a wise and prudent course would be pursued, which might make amends, at least in part, for the faults and mistakes of the past. But unfortunately the expectations of those who gave the matter attention and who were sincerely desirous of the success of the Shipping Board and the development of a strong and modern merchant marine, have not been realized; and the fortunes of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation are now at as low an ebb as it is possible to conceive of. Billions have been sacrificed and yet disaster and bankruptcy await the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Immediately after the armistice I urged members of the Commerce Committee of the Senate to enact legislation that would deal with this important question in a rational and progressive manner. I felt that if the vast sums expended were lost and that out of these tremendous appropriations an efficient and modern merchant marine were not developed, the country would manifest its disapproval and Congress would receive condemnation at the hands of the people. Months elapsed before a law was passed, and the law which was finally passed was, in my opinion, defective, and contained provisions and limitations which would operate against the successful development of an American merchant marine. Whether the law is wise and satisfactory or possesses inherent defects this must be conceded. We have spent billions and are each month losing millions, and there is no immediate prospect of either a suitable merchant marine or relief from the frightful burdens which the deficits resulting from operating the ships owned by the Government creates.

Our appropriations for the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation are as follows: In 1917, for the Shipping Board $100,000 and for the Emergency Fleet Corporation $50, 000,000; in 1918, $517,500 for the Shipping Board and $1,400,-000,000 for the Emergency Fleet Corporation; in 1919 the Government appropriated $842,500 for the Shipping Board and $1,806,701,000 for the Emergency Fleet Corporation-a later appropriation of $500,000 was also made to the corporation: in 1920, $772,986 was appropriated for the Shipping Board and $336,000,000 for the Emergency Fleet Corporation; in 1921 the Shipping Board received $400,000 and the Emergency Fleet Corporation $36,852,000; for 1922 the appropriations, including those carried by the pending deficiency bill, is $459,000 for the Shipping Board and $75,000,000 for the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

We have directly appropriated $3,091,986 for the Shipping Board and $3,365,053,000 for the Emergency Fleet Corporation. This, however, is not the end of the chapter. The Shipping Board and the corporation have been authorized to sell ships, and a number have been disposed of for cash and notes with adequate security. Seventy-two million dollars have been received in cash from the sale of ships and $40,000,000 from sale of materials and other personal property which had come into the hands of the Shipping Board. These amounts have been expended by the Shipping Board.

In addition, it has received millions of dollars in notes and other securities and, as I am advised, has either employed these in its operations or holds them as a part of its assets. In addition, Mr. President, $182,000,000 have been received in cash from the operation of ships controlled by the Shipping This amount has also been expended by it in ship construction and in its operations. Instead of the amounts received by it from operation and from the sale of property, it has devoted the sum to cover its enormous budget and to meet its My information is that the Shipping Board growing deficits. also received $112,000,000 from the War Department that likewise has been expended by the Shipping Board. I think it can be established that there have come into the hands of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation more than three and three-fourths billions of dollars.

It seems incredible that a sum so stupendous has been expended by the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Cor-But we would be reconciled to this expenditure if adequate results had been obtained. We have approximately vessels of a dead-weight tonnage of 11,000,000 tons. There are approximately 1,400 steel, 300 wooden, and 7 con-The concrete and wooden vessels are an absolute and total loss. In the recent testimony of Admiral Benson before the Senate committee, he spoke about "hiring" some one to take the wooden vessels out to sea and sink them. The concrete vessels have all been wrecked, and no doubt it would be a saving to the Government if the wooden ships were to be towed out to sea and sunk.

The Shipping Board, in my opinion, was delinquent in its duty in failing to sell some of its wooden ships when it had an opportunity. Immediately following the war it could have sold a considerable number of wooden ships at a price of approximately $30 per ton. For some reason no sales were made, and the opportunity for sale soon passed away. The wooden ships now are locked in the harbors, costing the Government enormous sums each month for care, insurance, and other expenses.

Other infirmities are apparent. It is discovered that they are too fragile for the machinery. They leak and give every evidence of being poorly constructed. Of the steel vessels, Admiral Benson testified that 706 were in operation. He ought to have added that many of them are operated intermittently. is that some are in service for a considerable part of the time, but many are in service only a portion of the time. To-day a large number of the 700 steel ships are inactive and 260 are tied up at the wharves and are not utilized for any purpose. It would be more economical for the Government if all were tied up. I was told to-day by one of the officials that whenever ships were withdrawn from service the losses from operating the ships were reduced.

No one knows the amount which the Government is losing monthly in its effort to operate the ships controlled by the Shipping Board. It has been said that the Government is losing a million dollars a day. I do not think that the loss is so great. I believe, however, an exhaustive and accurate examination of the operations of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation will demonstrate that the losses are from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 per month. In the past they have at various times exceeded that amount.

And it must be remembered that the ships are constantly deteriorating in value and that the Government is receiving no interest upon the three and three-fourths billions of dollars which it has invested as capital. It is only a question of a few years when the ships will be of but little if any value, so that there is no very satisfactory evidence that the Government will ever obtain returns of any consequence for the tremendous outlay which it has made. I have made considerable inquiry, and from all that I can learn all of the ships now owned by the Government, controlled by the Shipping Board, would not exceed in value $750,000,000. The ledger would therefore to-day show expenditures of approximately $3,750,000,000, and there would be assets resulting from these expenditures of approximately $750,000,000.

The steel vessels are divided into two classes, coal burners and oil burners. The oil burners constitute about 33 per cent of the entire number. Senators, of course, are informed as to the fact that the coal-burning ships are less valuable than the oil burners, and that the cost of operating the former is very much greater than that incurred in operating the oil-burning

About 150 of the steel ships were constructed on the Lakes, at points remote from the ocean. In order to reach the sea they were, after construction, sawn asunder and in this fragmentary form they were conveyed to the high seas. These ships, of course, are inferior, impaired in strength, and of but little value. It is doubtful whether they could be sold for more than $20 or $30 per ton.

Let me add in passing that some of the ships constructed by the Government cost as much as $300 per ton, and ships produced at this huge figure could not be sold to-day for more than $35 to $55 per ton. A number of the steel ships have a tonnage of from 5,000 to 7,000 tons.

The manner of their construction and the type followed make them unsatisfactory ships and very costly to operate. It will be impossible for them to operate as economically as vessels of better type, such as are owned by corporations engaged in ocean commerce. Many of the hulls of the type of which I am now speaking leak, and the water-tube boilers are imperfect and unsatisfactory.

We have heard a great deal of Hog Island and of the investigation that was conducted by Congress concerning the building activities at that yard. The evidence seemed to establish that there was inexcusable extravagance, if not criminal waste. Most of the ships constructed at Hog Island are defective. It will be impossible for most of the ships owned by the Government to be operated in competition with those of higher standards owned and operated by private corporations. In fairness, I should state that, generally speaking, the ships built by the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, the Union Iron Works Co., and the Sun Ship Co., at Chester, Pa., and the Newport News Co. were of a far higher grade, than any of the boats built at other places and now owned by the Government,

I have conversed with a number of persons who have traveled upon the Shipping Board vessels and the testimony is substantially unanimous that many of the ships are poorly built and that the hulls of many are so defective that they constantly leak and that in general they can not be called first class or high standard vessels

There is another question which I wish to briefly allude to. The act under which the Shipping Board is now operating was designed, so those who were advocating it contended, to place in the hands of private corporations or individuals at the earliest possible moment the ships built under the direction of the Shipping Board. The Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], the chairman of the Commerce Committee, appreciated, I believe, that governmental operation meant extravagance, waste, and failure. That has usually been the result where the Governmental operation meant extravagance, waste, and ment attempted to parallel activities which properly come within the sphere of private endeavor.

Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. President— Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I suggest to the Senator that the first section of the act declared that very policy, that this shipping should be ultimately privately owned and operated.

Mr. KING. The Senator is right. Let me read the words of the section, which I have before me. Section 1 of the marine act of 1920 provides that:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to do whatever may be necessary to develop and encourage the maintenance of such a marine, and, in so far as may not be inconsistent with the express provisions of this act, the United States Shipping Board shall, in the disposition of vessels and shipping property as hereinafter provided, in the making of rules and regulations, and in the administration of the shipping laws keep always in view this purpose and object as a primary end to be obtained.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will read immediately preceding that, he will find the declaration with reference to private ownership.

Mr. KING. The first part of the paragraph reads:

That it is necessary for the national defense and for the proper growth of its foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine with the best equipped and most suitable types of vessels sufficient to carry the greater portion of its commerce and serve as a naval or military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, ultimately to be owned and operated privately by citizens of the United States. of the United States

The Senator will remember that during the discussion of the bill objections that I urged against it rose out of the fact that I was afraid an interpretation would be placed upon this section. as well as other sections of the bill, by those charged with the duty of executing the law that would prevent the sale of the ships to individuals or corporations.

I believe that the measure gave too much discretion to the Shipping Board and officials of the Government who would be charged with carrying out the terms of the bill, and that they would exercise the discretion not in the interest of private ownership, but of governmental ownership and control and operation of the ships. Knowing the usual disposition of officials in executive departments of the Government to increase executive control and to arrogate greater power to executive instrumentalities and agencies, I felt that there would be a strong disposition to keep the ships under Government control and operation and to interpose obstacles of every form to the sale to individuals or private corporations in order that they might be operated by agencies other than Government.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know that that is true, but the Senator from Utah will also remember that another Senator on his side of the Chamber, the former Senator from Idaho, Mr. Nugent, protested against the passage of the bill because it made it too easy to dispose of and to sell the ships.

Mr. KING. Well, Mr. President, that merely illustrates the diversity of opinion existing not only upon both sides of the aisle but among Senators on the same side of the Chamber.

Section 7 of the act provides:

The board is authorized to sell, and if a satisfactory sale can not be made, to charter such of the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act, or otherwise acquired by the board, as will meet these requirements to responsible persons, who are citizens of the United States, who agree to establish and maintain such lines upon such terms of payment and other conditions as the board may deem just and necessary, and if no such citizen can be secured to supply such service by the purchase or charter of vessels on terms satisfactory to the board, the board shall operate vessels on such line until business is developed so that such vessels may be sold on satisfactory terms and the service maintained, or unless it shall appear within a reasonable time that such line can not be made self-sustaining.

Mr. President, I regard the act as a mandate to the board to sell the ships as soon as possible to private individuals or corporations for private operation under the American flag. Unfortunately, those charged with enforcing the law have given every possible intendment to the statute in hostility to what I regard its plain import to be.

Mr. President, I charge that many of the officials of the Shipping Board have deliberately attempted to prevent these ships from passing into the hands of private ownership. The Division of Operations has in the main been in the hands of incompetent persons, many of whom have been hostile to private ownership and private operation. They have, in my opinion, sought to prevent sales being made and have delayed from time to time when sales could have been made, giving pretexts for their actions which I submit can not, in the light of all the facts, prove satisfactory. It seems clear that the purpose has been to retain the ships to be owned and operated by the Government, and to create obstacles that would excuse their sale for private ownership and private operation.

Of course, the more ships owned and operated by the Government the more jobs there would be for the thousands of employees in the Shipping Board and in the Emergency Fleet Corporation. I regard it as a shame and a disgrace that so many thousands of persons have found refuge in these organizations. Not only in the United States has this great army of employees of the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation been found but battalions and companies and brigades can be found in many parts of the world.

Judge Payne when he came into the Shipping Board speedily saw the waste and inefficiency and the useless and dead timber in the various branches of the service, and he promptly brought about reforms and separated hundreds of individuals from the service. If he had been there a little longer the heads of thousands of employees would have fallen into the basket. But the Government is still paying for an army of employees. To what extent the present acting member of the board is responsible I shall leave others to say. But there seems to be a determination not to disturb what is called the "organization." It seems that the "Navy" idea prevails—to maintain an "organization" whether there is anything for the organization to do or not. The Shipping Board is now opening up new offices in various parts of the United States, though by so doing it increases the deficit and multiplies the number of employees. Whether it is greatly increasing the personnel at the present time I am unable to state.

I repeat that opportunities which have been afforded to sell-vessels have not been taken advantage of, as a result of which the Government has this great fleet, much of which is utterly valueless and none of it profitable, with the ships deteriorating and the Government receiving nothing by way of interest on its huge investment. Its assets are shrinking and deficits piling up, to be met by taxes imposed upon the people.

Under the provisions of the section of the statute just referred to the board has been derelict in its duty. It should have sold more of the ships, and where it was unable to sell it should have chartered, as the statute contemplated. It seems to have been more interested in retaining the ships and adopting a policy of "allocation." The ships now operated are not operated directly by the board, but through corporations to whom the ships have been allocated. My information is that about 150 agents or corporations are the beneficiaries of this allocation policy. Of that number, 25 seem to have received special consideration. I will not say that they have been specially favored, but they have had allocated to them some of the best ships and a greater number of ships.

This policy does not seem to have justified its adoption. Let it be understood that those who have received these ships have not been required to put up any capital or make any advancements. They have invested no money, but the ships have been turned over to them, and in some instances the Shipping Board has advanced all the costs and money called for in a preliminary way. These agents who have obtained these ships under this allocation policy receive a flat commission of 5 per cent on all outgoing cargoes. They also receive  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on all incoming cargoes. They incur no obligation whatever and are free from any llability, and without investing any capital they receive these large commissions. It is somewhat difficult to perceive what advantage there is to the Government by interposing these agencies. The Government runs all the risks, furnishes the ships, pays all expenses, and the corporations obtain these large commissions for being "allocatees."

It is obvious that the commissions of these corporations must be enormous. It will be observed that this policy perpetuates the Fleet Corporation and the Shipping Board. It delays the transfer of the ships to private ownership but it makes the Government the insurer and the loser and private corporations, without risks, the gainers and profiteers.

The policy in my opinion is reprehensible. The board should have sold the ships or chartered them. Moreover, Mr. President, as I am advised, there are two or three corporations that have most excellent routes and the very best of the ships, some of which at least private persons desired to purchase. Several months ago I offered a resolution asking for information as to why ships were not sold to those who desired to purchase them. I had information then and talked with one or more members of the Shipping Board in relation thereto, to the effect that parties in Los Angeles desired to purchase three ships. They were not sold to these parties, notwithstanding their offer was an advantageous one to the Government. But the ships were allocated to a corporation of whom it can be said that there was no discrimination against it.

At a later date I shall ask consideration of the resolution to which I have just referred. I shall attempt to ascertain why these three ships were not sold and why the corporation to which I have referred is now operating them at a loss to the Government and with no risk to the corporation. It is my opinion, Mr. President, that ships have been allocated without regard to the public welfare or to efficiency and proper operation and in total disregard of the rights of the public.

There is another phase of this matter which I desire to mention, relating to the modus operandi of the board where sales have been made. In some instances where the vessels had been sold, the vendees have attempted to build up a trade. They have expended their time, made heavy investments, and were, in good faith, attempting to develop a merchant marine. were putting in their money and giving their time and their energies to this legitimate enterprise. It would have been supposed that the Shipping Board would have encouraged these persons and corporations; that it would have aided in every proper way their enterprise, but the reverse has been true. The Shipping Board allocated to corporations other vessels knowing, and indeed intending, that they should parallel the same routes as those being established by private ownership and enter into active competition with the individuals and corporations who, in good faith, had purchased ships from the Government and were spending their time and money to build up a profitable business.

It is apparent that governmental policy of this character would prove disastrous to private operation. If individuals or corporations purchase vessels from the Government, they have a right to expect that the Government will not, immediately at least, enter into competition with them, relying upon the taxpayers of the country to pay the deficits caused by driving to the wall and bankruptcy those to whom they had sold Government It would be different if the Government or those to whom it allocated ships engaged in competition based upon service and upon cheaper rates, depending upon their ability and their superior service to win success. But when the Shipping Board delivers ships to corporations, knowing that they will be run at a loss and that these corporations will make large profits and that the Government will have to meet the losses, and that such operation will drive to disaster corporations which purchased ships from the Government and in good faith attempted to build up an ocean commerce, then I submit that a wrong has been done. I protest this prostitution of the power and authority possessed by the board, and I protest against further burdening taxpayers of the United States to maintain such an iniquitous and indefensible policy.

Let me illustrate the situation. Individuals form a corporation and purchase one or more ships from the Government, paying the initial amounts required by the Government, giving such security to the board for deferred payments as is required. The corporation maps out its route, acquires docks or docking privileges and incurs heavy expenses in starting its new enterprise. The Shipping Board thereupon allocates to a corporation one or more ships, and this corporation parallels the route or routes of the private corporation purchasing from the Government. It incurs no liability; it operates at a loss, knowing that the Government, through the Shipping Board, will pay the loss; and it makes its 5 per cent profit upon all outgoing tonnage and 2½ per cent on all incoming tonnage.

Such competition is unfair, dishonest, and the taxpayers of our country are now called upon to support this indefensible method of procedure. The result has been that individuals who in good faith invested large sums in the purchase of ships have been driven into bankruptcy and the Government has seized the ships because of default in meeting deferred payments, and these ships have passed to receivers who have operated them at great expense to the Government, all of which the taxpayers are called upon to pay

The resolution which I offered this morning refers to the question of receivership. My information is that one firm of attorneys has handled 8 or 10 receiverships and have been paid already $70,000 in cash, the taxpayers of the Government having to pay it, and they have claims against the Government for additional fees. I know who these attorneys are, but my resolution asks for full information. The situation needs clarifying. I want to know whether any persons connected with these receivership proceedings have been or are now in the employ of the Shipping Board of the United States. I want a full investigation of this particular activity of the Shipping Board; that is, its sale of ships to individuals, its driving them by competition into bankruptcy, its forcing of purchasers into the hands of receivers, and I want to know the cost of these receivership proceedings, who got the money, and, generally, full information in regard to the entire matter.

I should say, in passing, that when the ships were taken over from the purchasers by the Shipping Board it knew that costs would immediately result to the Government. It would have been better to have left the purchasers in possession of the ships, notwithstanding deferred payments, because they might in time have worked out their plans and paid for the ships, and in the meantime the Government would have been relieved from the burdens which immediately follow when possession of ships is assumed.

The policy of the board, Mr. President, seems to have been one designed to discourage the successful liquidation by the board of the vast property committed to its care, to prevent private ownership or operation, and to maintain undisturbed the Division of Operations, which is culpable in the highest degree in its pernicious system of allocations and its destructive methods.

Mr. President, there is another matter to which I desire to refer. The price of the ships sold has been fixed without regard to the factors of market value specified in section 5 of the act, and the contracts have been loaded down with conditions so burdensome as to make their performance by the purchasers well nigh impossible.

It has recently been said that one of the first duties of the new board will be to take from those who have purchased, because of their inability to make payments, the ships which they have contracted for. The Government by going into competition with the purchasers through its allocating organizations has, of course, made it impossible for them to make profits and, having been driven practically out of the business, the plan now is to take the property away from them and place it in the hands of these "allocating" specialists, who will make large profits, and the Government will be called upon to meet the constant deficits created by them. The fair and prudent course would be to permit the purchasing corporations to continue to operate them under the best terms and arrangements possible until they can meet their obligations to the Government. It is certain that while they are operating the ships there will be no losses to be met by the United States. If the board seizes the ships and assumes control, immediately the Government is compelled to meet all costs resulting from such possession or operation which may be attempted.

A pertinent matter is called to my mind-a matter which Senators will recall: Judge Payne offered for sale a number of ships which we had acquired from Germany. provoked a storm of criticism. It was alleged that he was selling them for $29,000,000 when their value was at least $75,000,000. What was the result? An injunction was obtained and subsequently dissolved. The opportunity to sell was lost, and the boats have cost the Government millions since, and it would be impossible to sell them to-day for $12,000,000. Payne appreciated the situation and was attempting to sell ships which he believed would soon be unsalable, and at a price which was fair to the Government. The United States still has the ships; it is expending millions in their upkeep and maintenance and attempted operation. My information is that it will be impossible to sell them for more than $12,000,000.

Mr. President, there is another matter which I wish to mention and which has been an impediment to the sale of the ships held by the Shipping Board.

One of the terms which has been attached to the contracts of sale-and I desire the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones]-requires that insurance shall be taken out in the manner prescribed by the Shipping Board. I want to invite the Senator's attention to the fact that the Shipping Board has compelled the purchasers to take out their insurance with the American Marine Insurance Syndicate, whose officers in the main are interested in the old steamship companies, which are either directly or indirectly controlled, some of them at least, by interests other than American interests, and the rates of insurance have been unusually high.

This syndicate exercises a virtual monopoly in the American marine insurance market, and it exacts from the purchasers and the board requires it-an insurance premium of from 5 per cent to 5% per cent on the valuation of $165 to $185 per ton. It is obvious what the effect is. The market value of ships to-day is from $20 to $65 a ton. None of the ships sold by the to-day is from $20 to $65 a ton. Shipping Board would bring $65 per ton, and yet the purchasers have been compelled to take out insurance with this insurance monopoly, and pay from 5 to 5% per cent upon the valuation of $165 to $185 a ton. It is manifest that private persons or corporations, those who own their own ships without obligation or liability to the Government, and are in a position to negotiate their own insurance, can secure rates much lower.

The result is that the purchasers of ship tonnage are compelled to pay, even though they load their vessels, from 15 to 25 per cent of their gross operating revenue as insurance premiums. This is such a heavy burden that it makes successes in operation difficult, if not impossible, no matter what economies are practiced and skill observed. It is an unfair advantage and burden, and seems to be aimed at the destruction of those corporations that purchase boats from the Government and attempt to build up an American merchant marine.

The sales contract further requires the purchaser to pay 5 per cent interest on the unpaid balance of the purchase price of the vessels and to set upon its books a depreciation charge of 5 per cent, based upon this same excessive valuation.

The sales contract further provides that in the operation of purchased vessels the purchaser agrees to observe and maintain all conference rates which may be either promulgated or approved by the board. In other words, the whole sales policy is one designed to make it impossible for the purchaser to operate his vessels at a profit, with the result that public confidence in marine securities will be absolutely destroyed and investors in these securities will lose every dollar invested.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the appropriation which is carried in this bill. I think it is time for Congress to cease meeting these deficits and encouraging extravagance and incompetency in these organizations which have already proven so expensive to the Government and the American taxpayers.

Admiral Benson contends that further sums are required to build ships now in process of construction. It is known that when the ships are completed they can not be sold, in some instances at least, for the amounts required to build them. are being built upon war contracts at prices exceedingly high. and when completed there will be no market; or if a market is secured, at prices which will not reimburse the Government for the amounts required for the completion of the ships. It would seem that the wise and prudent thing to do is to cease construction, at least until there can be a reorganization of the board and a policy adopted which will end for all time the wicked waste and criminal extravagance that have attended the administration of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation during the greater part of their existence. I suggest, Mr. President, that if the Government is to pursue the policy of establishing a merchant marine, it may be required to adopt a course something along these lines:

(a) Amortize its vessels down to the present world-market valuation.

(b) Permit the operator upon his own responsibility and with his own resources to build up effective organizations.

(c) Eliminate the present erroneous conditions interposed by the board in their sales contracts.

(d) If the American marine insurance monopoly is to be continued as an agency, compel them to insure upon a reasonable basis.

(e) Let the board in the exercises of its regulatory power prosecute all carriers who by any device are violating the rebate and discrimination of the shipping act.

Wherever the Government desires to establish a trade route that is at present unattractive to private capital and it desires to allocate vessels to place upon such a berth, let the vessels be allocated to reliable companies, who are undertaking in good faith to purchase Government tonnage.

Mr. President, at a later date, when the resolution which I have offered to-day is up for consideration, I shall submit further observations in regard to the Shipping Board, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and the course which should be pursued by the Government.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Chairman of the United States Shipping Board, transmitting a further reply in detail to Senate resolution No. 413, dated December 27, 1920, relative to moneys appropriated, profits, capital, number and description of vessels, system of accounting, contracts of operation, number of employees, etc., covering transactions of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation from September 7, 1916, to February 28, 1921, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, what is the opinion of the Chair as to the immediate disposition of this report? Is it in

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in printed form.

Mr. WARREN. I take it that it should go to the Committee on Appropriations and be printed; but since the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. King] is seemingly so vitally interested in it, and since he has introduced this morning a resolution concerning it, may I ask the Senator whether he desires to consult it immediately?

Mr. KING. Oh, no. The report just submitted was in response to a resolution, as I understand, offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Edge]. As the Secretary has read the extent of the report, it does not reach the questions which I have suggested in the resolution which I have offered.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator what it does cover? Is it a list of the employees and their salaries?

Mr. KING. A list of the employees and the number of ships, and some unimportant matters. It does not reach the questions that will enable us to determine what ought to be done

Mr. KENYON. Is it a list of the employees and their salaries? Are they included there?

Mr. KING. No; I think not. There may be a list, but I do not think it is a list of the employees.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps, like the shipping, it is surplusage over and above what the Senator required in his resolution, and what the Senator to my right wishes to add to the salary list, and so on.

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to add anything to the salary I want to take away some of them.

Mr. WARREN. I am willing that the Senator shall make the amount expended by the Shipping Board go as high as the flights of fancy will permit, because you can hardly go above the actual fact of the amount of money taken out of the Treasury; but what I should like to establish before we get through is what we are going to do with these many hundreds of ships that we can not even turn loose and abandon, because we would be liable for damages if they should drift out into the harbor or anywhere and cause damage through collision or other mishap.

We can not burn them up, because they will endanger some surrounding property. In this condition, after expending nearly $4,000,000,000 of good money, what shall we do with the product of it? Shall we undertake to save it?

In this bill there are one hundred and eleven million eight hundred and some odd thousand dollars appropriated for the various purposes that were stated, that it is promised will finish all the ships that are to be finished and put in order those that are out of order; and that, with the amount that is due, is to cancel the indebtedness, and so forth, so that we may then have in the clear the product of all of this money, the combina-tion that men and circumstances have constructed into shipping.

The Senator from Utah will remember that on the part of the Republicans-I do not like to bring in politics, except that we have to state what man or what party does this or does thatfor many years the Senate and House made efforts to build up a merchant marine. A merchant marine was believed by those on this side to be something valuable enough so that we might do as other countries did to some extent, provide mail subsidies or a price for carrying the mail that would really amount to some small subsidy. When the other party took charge, they concluded that it was better to build this merchant marine, and, of course, then both parties were equally guilty in the prosecution. It was war time, and we had to have ships; we had to get our troops over, and so forth. We have expended three or four billion dollars for these ships, approximately four billions. It is a question now as to what we shall do with them,

As I say, we are in a position where we can not let go if we want to, without large expense, and the committee believed that it is worth this one more trial to appropriate this hundred and odd million dollars-I do not know that we shall get through conference or get off this floor with that much-to try to save whatever is left of this four or five billion dollar expenditure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that he is spending money to complete ships which, when completed, can not be sold to cover the amount which we are now asked to appropriate?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me, I made the inquiry that I did with regard to the Edge report that just came in so that he might have the benefit of it if he wished; but I understand that the committee that reported the resolution believes the report ought to be printed, and unless the Chair has other views I suggest that it be printed and sent to the Committee on Appropriations.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6300) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment passed over on page 2, under the heading "Civil Service Commission," be now taken up.
The VICE PRESIDENT.

The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Reading Clerk. On page 22, lines 24 to 26, inclusive, the committee proposes to insert the following paragraph:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to transfer, without payment therefor, to the Civil Service Commission one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, how many vehicles have they? Mr. WARREN. I am not certain that they have any, and I know they are not overstocked, because sometimes they come here on foot to do business with the committee. I am informed that they have none at the present time, and that was my impression

Mr. KING. I am rather surprised, because from all I can learn we are furnishing vehicles to the Alien Property Custodian, who must be brought down to his office every morning in an automobile, and to other employees of the Government. I objected, it would be on the ground that there was discrimination and that we had better take care of them all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued, as follows:

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

For enforcement of the provisions of an act to prevent the spread of contagious diseases in the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1897, and an act for the prevention of scarlet fever, diphtheria, measles, whooping cough, chicken pox, epidemic cerebrospinal meningitis, and typhoid fever in the District of Columbia, approved February 9, 1907, and an act to provide for registration of all cases of tuberculosis in the District of Columbia, for free examination of sputum in suspected cases, and for preventing the spread of tuberculosis in said District of Columbia, approved May 13, 1908, under the direction of the health officer of said District, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921, $6,000: Provided, That the limitation of $25,000 in such act on the employment of personal services from the appropriation for this purpose is increased to $31,000.

Mr. KING. I would like to know whether this is a deficit

Mr. KING. I would like to know whether this is a deficit or whether it is an increase in the appropriation for the next fiscal year; and if it is a deficit, why it was created; and if it is an increase in appropriation, why it was not embraced in the general appropriation bill when it received consideration at the hands of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. It is to make good a shortage which was occasioned by outbreaks that were unexpected. In fact, in appropriating a round sum for the Health Service, various things must be taken into consideration as likely to happen. The service may have to overrun slightly the amounts we appropriate.

Mr. KING. My recollection is that we made special appropriations for these unexpected epidemics and outbreaks, though I do not remember whether they were carried in deficiency bills or not.

Mr. WARREN. This is for the District of Columbia, and I do not believe we have made any extra appropriation for that.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 20, after the word "supplies," to strike out "for the fiscal years that follow" and to insert "$1,000," so as to read:

Municipal court: For contingent expenses, including books, law books, books of reference, fuel, light, telephone, blanks, dockets, and all other necessary miscellaneous items and supplies, $1,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the balance of that municipal court item is stricken out there and transferred to another place in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Municipal on page 7, after line 21, to strike out: "For 1921, $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 22, to strike out: "For 1922, $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 23, to strike

For additional employees from June 1, 1921, to June 30, 1922, inclusive, at annual rates of compensation as follows: Jury clerk, $1,600; 4 enrolling clerks, at $1,600 each; stenographer and typist, $1,400; in all, $10,183.34.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 2, to strike

For compensation of jurors from June 1, 1921, to June 30, 1922, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 4, to strike oat:

For lodging, meals, and accommodations for jurors and deputy United States marshals, while in attendance upon them, when ordered by the court, from June 1, 1921, to June 30, 1922, $100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 8, to strike out:

For alterations and repairs to buildings, $1,000, to continue available until June 30, 1922,

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 10, to strike ont:

For furniture and equipment, $1,200, to continue available until June 30, 1922.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to line 26, page 9, the last paragraph read being as follows:

Miscellaneous expenses: For such miscellaneous expenses as may be authorized by the Attorney General for the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and its officers, including the furnishing and collecting of evidence where the United States is or may be a party in interest, including also such expenses other than for personal services as may be authorized by the Attorney General for the Court of Appeals, District of Columbia, $5,000.

Mr. KING. If I understand the provisions on this page correctly, they all relate to the fiscal year 1921?

WARREN. Nineteen hundred and twenty-one; and let me further assure the Senator that until we reach page 75 every item is for a deficiency for 1921.

Mr. KING. This is a deficiency? Mr. WARREN. This is a deficiency.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether, after investigation, he is convinced that those deficiencies are authorized or warranted?

Mr. WARREN. Otherwise we should not have included them in the bill.

Mr. KING. I know the devotion of the Senator to economy, but I can not understand how there could be a deficiency in that one item of $40,000, because we made very liberal appropriations last year. Mr. WARREN. No; we did not make very liberal appropria-tions for this city. We cut down very materially, and the city, as the Senator knows, is part of our Government, and pays 50 or 60 per cent of the expenses, and the commissioners have the power, of course, to come to us for these deficiencies. They make very careful estimates, and the items are well proven. Since the war and the return of the soldiers, and since the change in labor conditions, which has thrown men out of employment, there has been a great transient population in Washington. As the Senator knows, this is a sort of Mecca, especially so for the men who were in the service, and they must be taken care of.

Mr. KING. Just a word. Of course, the Senator did not mean to be offensive by the rather abrupt and curt way in which he interrupted my statement. Notwithstanding the position of the Senator, I do affirm that we were liberal in the appropria-tions for the District of Columbia. I can not carry the figures in my head, but I know that in 1918 the appropriations for the District of Columbia were less than $17,000,000. The following year they were increased, and last year they were more than $23,000,000, and this year approximately $24,000,000. So that we have been increasing them by leaps and bounds. Instead of being niggardly, we have been prodigal in the grants which have been made to the District.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator undoubtedly believes he is correct, but the facts do not justify his statement.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, the facts do justify the statement that we made the appropriations which I have stated, and the facts do justify the statement I made that we have been prodigal and not niggardly.

Mr. WARREN. That there was appropriated $23,000,000 and something?

Mr. KING. Approximately that. Mr. WARREN. It was approximately a long way less than that. In fact, some $4,000,000 less.

Mr. KING. I will get the figures and verify that.

Mr. WARREN. If I made any curt reply to the Senator, I beg his pardon. But I receive some curt replies from the Senator, which I take as his manner, and as I know he is a friend, I take no offense.

Mr. KING. I suppose that ends the controversy.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Judgments," on page 11, line 8, after the numerals "66," to insert "and Senate Document No. 24"; and in line 10, after the word "Congress," to strike out "$21,909.91" and to insert "$22,709.91," so as to read:

For payment of judgments, including costs, rendered against the District of Columbia, as set forth in House Documents Nos. 6, 18, and 66 and Senate Document No. 24 of the Sixty-Seventh Congress, $22,709.91, together with a further sum to pay the interest at not exceeding 4 per cent per annum on such judgments, as provided by law, from the date the same became due until the date of payment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 14, to strike out "Sixty per cent of the foregoing sums for the District of Columbia shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and 40 per cent out of the Treasury of the United States," and in lieu to insert:

Sixty per cent of the foregoing sums for the District of Columbia for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and 40 per cent out of the Treasury of the United States; and such sums as relate to the fiscal year 1920, and prior fiscal years, shall be paid 50 per cent out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and 50 per cent out of the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued, as follows:

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Vocational rehabilitation: For an additional amount for carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918, as amended, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921, $15,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. I have here a committee amendment that will carry out the requirements of the board, which has adopted resolutions at its meetings requesting this legislation. I send the amendment to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated. The READING CLERK. On page 14, after line 10 and after the numerals "$15,000,000," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That payments for the support and maintenance of persons dependent upon any trainee of the board as provided by section 2 of the act may, in the discretion of the board, be paid either direct to such dependent or dependents or to the trainee upon whom they are dependent: And provided further, That any person entitled under the provisions of the vocational rehabilitation act, as amended, to take vocational training must make application therefor within 18 months from the date of the approval of this act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the chairman of the committee if he would object if I ask unanimous consent to read the bill merely for committee amendments? Why should we not read the bill just for committee amendments first?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator would like to have the whole of the bill read-

Mr. McKELLAR. The whole of the bill is being read-that is, the House provisions as well as the Senate committee amendments. I am suggesting that it may be read for committee amendments only.

Mr. WARREN. I did not make that request. I asked that the formal reading of the bill might be dispensed with.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, if the Senator objects, I shall not make the request.

Mr. WARREN. I shall not object, but I wish to explain why I did not ask it. The Senator from Utah [Mr. King] and others requested that it should be read in full, and so I did not go further than to assent. Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be read for committee amendments only.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, just the committee amendments?

Mr. McKELLAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 10, to strike

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION.

Not exceeding $5,000 of the appropriation of $100,000 for the Federal Power Commission, contained in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922, may be used for necessary printing and binding.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 15, to insert: INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

For payment to Henry Jones Ford, on account of services rendered as Interstate Commerce Commissioner from June 11, 1920, to March 4, 1921, $8,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 18, to strike

For the completion of vessels now under construction, fiscal year 1922, $25,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Treasury Department," on page 17, after line 17, to strike out:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

For the salaries of officers and employees during the fiscal year 1922 t annual rates as follows (now being paid from the appropriation Expenses of loans"):

For the salaries of officers and employees during the fiscal year 1922 at annual rates as follows (now being paid from the appropriation "Expenses of loans"):

Commissioner of the Public Debt, $6,000;

Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits, $6,000;

Division of Deposits: Chief of division, $3,500; assistant chief of division, $2,500; clerks—1 $2,250, 1 $2,000, 1 $1,800, 1 $1,600, 1 $1,400; messenger, $840; assistant messenger, $720; in all, $16,610.

Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants: For the force to be transferred to this division on account of the transfer of duties from the Division of Public Moneys, at annual rates of compensation during the fiscal year 1922, as follows: Assistant chief of division, $2,500; clerks—2 at $2,000 each, 3 at $1,800 each, 3 at $1,600 each, 2 at $1,400 each, 2 at $1,400 each, 2 at $1,200 each; 2 messengers, at $840 each; assistant messenger, $720; in all, $24,300.

For expenses incident to the discharge of the duties imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury by the transportation act, 1920, and the Federal control act approved March 21, 1918, as amended, and for expenses arising in connection with loans and credits to foreign Governments under the Liberty loan acts and the Victory Liberty loan act and in connection with credits granted or conditions entered into under the act providing for the relief of populations in Europe and contiguous countries, including personal services in the District of Columbia, fiscal year 1922, $25,000.

The appropriation for "Expenses of loans," contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922, is hereby made available for expenditures in the office of the commissioner of the public debt and for expenditures in the Post Office Department in connection with the distribution, sale, and keeping of accounts of war savings and thrift stamps, as provided in the deficiency appropriation act approved November 4, 1918. The appropriation for "Expenses of loans" contained in section 8 of the first Liberty bon

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 17, to strike

OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,

For expenses of Federal reserve and national currency (to be reimbursed by the Federal reserve and national banks): For additional employees during the fiscal year 1922 at annual rates of compensation as follows: Clerk-counters—3 at $1,400 each, 3 at $1,200 each; 7 counters at $1,000 each; in all, $14,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, after line 9, to strike

For the enforcement of the national prohibition act during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, after line 11, to insert:

For expenses to enforce the provisions of the "national prohibition act" and the act entitled "An act to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon, all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or cocoa leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes," approved December 17, 1914, as amended by the "revenue act of 1918," including the same objects specified under this head in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead of "Bureau of War Risk Insurance," on page 21, after line 3, to strike out:

The third proviso of the paragraph making appropriations for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, as contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922, is hereby amended to read as follows: "Provided further, That no person shall over of the property.

be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum except the following: Three at not exceeding $7,500 each, 9 at not exceeding $5,000 each, 28 at not exceeding $4,500 each, 36 at not exceeding $4,000 each, 42 at not exceeding $3,500 each, 49 at not exceeding $3,000 each, 68 at not exceeding $2,500 each, and 215 at not exceeding $2,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 22, in line 8, after the word the" where it occurs the first time, insert the words "War and Navy Departments and the," so that the clause will read:

The total amount appropriated by the said act shall be available for the purposes specified in the said act and allotments may be made from said amount at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to the War and Navy Departments and the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to be transferred to its credit and disbursed by it under the approval and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury for the purposes of the said act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, under the sub-head "Public buildings," on page 22, after line 17, to strike

New York, N. Y., quarantine station: For improvements, including the water-supply system, power plant, and additional barracks, $500,000, to continue available during the fiscal year 1922.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I shall have to confess my disappointment that the Committee on Appropriations saw fit to strike out the provision for the improvement of the quarantine station at New York. The matter is one—

Mr. WARREN. May I explain a little why that is cut out so the Senator may know better how to direct his remarks?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The only information we had was the evidence taken by the House committee. It developed that the number of immigrants received had been very large at times, and especially before the law was recently passed curtailing immigration, and that it has very sensibly decreased since. It is noticeable that at New York and Boston, where no one questions the necessity of having ample facilities, there seemed to be the building of new barracks included. When the bill was before the House committee that feature seemed to have been rather emphasized, because in the great rush of immigration they have had to use even some boats for additional space for the care of the immigrants while entering the country.

Of course, Philadelphia and Baltimore were also asking for something. In those cities at that time there was an average of about one a day during the year. For that reason it was thought best to strike out this item and let it go to conference and get further information on the matter.

I will say on the part of the committee that there is no disposition to curtail the real needs for the present year for this purpose. If the Senator will pardon me still further, an idea prevailed something like this—and the Senator can set me right if I am in error: We passed a bill some 10 or 15 years ago providing that the United States should take over and pay for all of these quarantine stations. At the time Mr. Fitzgerald was chairman of the House committee and I happened to be chairman of the Senate committee. As I said, that was some 10 years or more ago. Mr. Fitzgerald opposed that idea. He said it was a money-making affair for New York. Some others were objecting in the same way with reference to Baltimore and other places.

However, the stations were finally purchased, and it was after that time—and that is why I wish the Senator to explain-and because we passed a law empowering and perhaps compelling us to take them over and did not proceed to take them over for a number of years that they were allowed to greatly depreciate and therefore throw the entire deterioration of 10 years on the Government. I think more particularly involved was the fact that they were inclined to think there were more buildings called for than were necessary. We deemed it best to strike out the provision and let it go to conference, so whatever information the Senator can give us we shall be glad to have. I shall also ask the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr.

Lodge] to tell us about the proposition at Boston. Mr. WADSWORTH. The only item of which I have any real knowledge is the New York quarantine station item. The agreement for the taking over of the New York quarantine station by the Federal Government was reached about five years The New York State government, through appropriate officials, met a commission appointed, as I recollect, by the Secretary of the Treasury-arbitrators in a sense-and came to a rather prompt agreement as to the value of the property. New York Legislature passed an act authorizing the turning

At about that time and shortly after this agreement was arrived at as to value I introduced, I am sure for the first time, an amendment to one of the appropriation bills-I think the sundry civil appropriation bill-appropriating the sum which had been agreed upon by the Federal and State authorities. That amendment, as I recollect, failed in the House largely, if I am not mistaken, on account of the opposition of Mr. Fitzgerald, of Brooklyn, who from the beginning had opposed the entire policy of taking over the stations along the coast and making them national institutions.

Of course, the agreement was reached in accordance with the law, and the agreement was satisfactory to both State and National Governments, but a delay of five years has occurred since the agreement was reached. It is very easy to see that after the Federal and State Governments had reached an agreement as to the amount which the State should be paid under the statute which authorized such an agreement and such a transfer, that the State should not thereafter spend money on new construction at the New York quarantine station. It would be folly to expect a government or a corporation or a person that was about to surrender title to property to continue to spend money upon it in the matter of construction, so that accounts, in part at least, for the present condition of the quarantine station at New York, which was taken over, as I recollect, on March 1 of this year, only three months ago, all this time having intervened through no fault of New York, through no fault of the Treasury Department, but through the fault of the Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President-

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator speaks of an agreement. He has stated that the amendment which he introduced to an appropriation bill authorized the Federal Government to take over the quarantine station, and that the New York Legislature authorized the conveyance of it, but was there an agreement by the proper authorities, agents of both Governments, that the Federal Government would take it over?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The law referred to by the Senator from Wyoming was passed 10 or 15 years ago, laying down the policy that the Federal Government would purchase these institutions from the several States, agreements as to price to be entered into by the respective Governments. From time to time quarantine station after quarantine station on both coasts was picked up by the Federal Government and paid for through appropriations made in accordance with the agree-

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of what did the agreement consist? In other words, I am trying to find out whether there was a contract between the Federal Government and the State government, because, as the Senator stated it, he only speaks of an act of the Federal Government authorizing it to be done.

Mr. WARREN. Probably it was an appraisal.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.
Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did both parties agree to the appraisal? Mr. WADSWORTH. They were both parties to the agree-

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But was there a contract that the Federal Government would take the property at the appraisal

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; there was not a contract that the Federal Government must take it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I mean.

WADSWORTH. But of course the Federal Government joined in the appraisal and came to the agreement with the State on the faith of the law which had laid down the policy that when Congress appropriated the money from time to time the stations would be taken over.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What I am trying to elucidate is whether the Federal Government made a contract from which it can not recede or whether it simply declared a policy which Congress is at liberty to change now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Federal Government made no contract and this appropriation is not to pay for the quarantine station.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand it is for the maintenance

Mr. WADSWORTH. For the improvement of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand that, but is the title still as a matter of fact in the State of New York?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is in the Federal Government. Mr. BRANDEGEE. They have taken title?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; and they paid for it, and I was explaining that so great was the delay in getting the money appropriated to take over the property that the institution had gone downhill in condition because, as I said a moment ago, we could not very well expect the State of New York to continue to spend money in new construction at the quarantine station when they knew at any moment the Federal Government would take it over at the agreed price.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Federal Government now owns the property and it needs repairs, of course the Government either has to repair it or let it go to rack and ruin.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the point, and the Committee on Appropriations has stricken out the item for repairs.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand the matter now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand the spirit in which the chairman of the committee has approached the proposition, and if everything were certain in this life as to what conferees would do, I would be perfectly willing for it to go to conerence. This, however, is a matter of vast importance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If it is simply desired that the matter shall go to conference, the Senate could slightly reduce the appropriation carried by the House provision. That would appropriation carried by the House provision. throw it into conference without cutting the provision entirely out of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I was just about to ask a question, because I know the sincerity with which the Senator from New York approaches these questions, and I am sure his opinion is the same as mine, that necessary repairs should be made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We must provide for them. Mr. WARREN. But the appropriation of $500,000 was predicated quite largely upon the typhus fever scare.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator that was not merely scare. There were a number of cases of typhus at Boston. Mr. WARREN. There was a scare, and the existence of typhus was a fact also, of course.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Typhus also got into the city of New

Mr. LODGE. It got into the city of Boston. Mr. WARREN. This item includes a water-supply system, power plant, additional barracks, and so forth. I should like the Senator from New York to pass upon the question whether it would not serve all purposes to settle the matter here, and cut the appropriation of $500,000 to some extent?

Mr. WADSWORTH. As to the items which the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Warren] has mentioned, I desire to say that there certainly exists a most peculiar situation at the quarantine in New York. The water for that place has to be towed to it in barges. The station is on Staten Island. There is no water supply on the island available at the present time for the use of the quarantine station, which actually is the greatest quarantine station on the continent, one which on occasions has to shelter from 2,000 to 4,000 incoming immigrants, who have been in contact with typhus or smallpox or yellow fever, or whatever the disease may be. The water for the use of the quarantine station has to be towed in tank barges down the bay to Staten Island and pumped out of the barges. One of the items which are included in the $500,000 proposed to be appropriated is to extend a certain pipe line across Staten Island, which will bring the water supply directly to the station from an entirely reliable source. It costs the Government $40,000 a year to tow tank barges which are filled with water down there. The officials of the quarantine station estimate that the building of a pipe line for that purpose would save $40,000 in one year.

Mr. WARREN. And the cost of its construction would be

Mr. WADSWORTH. It would be $50,000.

Mr. WARREN. That would be the cost of the pipe line? Mr. LODGE. That would be the cost of the pipe line.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is as I recall it. Mr. LODGE. That is correct.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So we should save $40,000 for the first year and every year thereafter by comparison. It seems to me ridiculous that the water supply for a great quarantine station should have to be towed in tanks many miles down New York

As to the barracks, the Senator from Wyoming has probably learned from the House hearings that they have had extreme difficulty there; they have even had to resort to the use of some old hulks.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; we have had all that testimony before us. The only question as to the item in relation to the barracks and not putting it in was the doubt as to whether the condition referred to is now continuing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The statement of the officials as to that matter is that they expect the condition to continue for many years to come.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The medical profession as well as the public health officers are really very much alarmed at the state of affairs there. Every now and then they have to unload 2,000 immigrants from one ship, and they have only beds for 1,200, and only then can they use the 1,200 beds at the quarantine station if the 1,200 are equally divided as to sex. They want beds The present barracks are utterly inadequate, because, as every Senator knows, there are some occasions when six or seven or eight immigrant-carrying ships, with from 15,000 to 20,000 immigrants, come into New York Harbor in one To have barracks ashore for the immigrants who have been in contact with typhus or smallpox capable of taking care of only 1,200 means that they have to hold ships in the bay and keep all those immigrants huddled together on the ships.

Under such circumstances it is perfectly hopeless to try to keep them away from contact with any considerable number of their fellows who may be infected with contagious diseases. Indeed, I think a case occurred at Boston where they had to hold a ship which was full of immigrants for 21 days.

Mr. LODGE. That is true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The result was that 60 of those poor immigrants contracted typhus. Had the officials been able to put them ashore, to segregate those with typhus or smallpox or yellow fever or whatever the disease with which they were infected might have been, the remainder would not have suf-

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.
Mr. LODGE. In the instance to which the Senator from New York has referred there were 21 cases of typhus on two ships. There was no place on shore to which the immigrants could be taken, so they had to be kept on the ships. The result was that the 21 cases increased in the days they were held there to the number of 60 of what is called secondary typhus. Typhus fever is a very dangerous disease.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a terrible infliction to impose upon those innocent people merely because we have not facilities for taking care of them.

Mr. WARREN. Upon the statements which the Senator from New York makes, I will ask that the amendment be disagreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well. Mr. WARREN. But in that same connection I desire to say that it is very evident to my mind that if the conditions existing at Boston are anywhere near like those at New York an appropriation for the Boston quarantine station should also be made. The Senator from Massachusetts, I assume, can inform us about the condition at Boston?

Mr. LODGE. I can state the Boston case very briefly. Of course, the number of immigrants that come to Boston is very small compared with those who come to New York, but Boston is the second immigration port in the United States. The Public Health Service estimated that there was needed for the Boston quarantine station an appropriation of $384,000. The other House, however, cut that sum down to $150,000. The people of Boston were very anxious to have the appropriation increased, but I declined to attempt to secure any increase whatever, because I knew how important it was to keep the appropriations for this year as low as possible. I did not go before the Senate committee or ask for any increase. I let the matter stand as it was fixed in the House appropriation, which was less than half of what had been estimated for. I was not notified that the committee of the Senate proposed cutting the appropriation out, so I had no opportunity to appear before the committee in reference to the matter. I only yesterday learned by telegram from Boston that the appropriation had been stricken out.

It put me in the rather awkward position of appearing to have neglected it, which I certainly had not done, but I did not want to increase the appropriation allowed by the House, which, I repeat, was less than half of that which was asked for by the department.

The situation at Boston is very much like that at New York. Some years ago the Government took over the quarantine station, and, as Dr. Cumming says, they were old buildings, which had not been kept up, for the same reason as that stated by the Senator from New York as being applicable to the buildings at the quarantine station in New York.

The facts as to the quarantine station in Boston happened to be very fully discussed in the House hearings. Immigration to the port of Boston has been increasing, owing to the fact that some new steamboat lines have been established and other new lines are anticipated. I should like to read what Dr. Creel said in reply to a question about dormitory facilities. The question was asked, "What barracks capacity have you there now?" The reply was, "One thousand five hundred." Then Dr. Creel said:

The dormitory facilities are sufficient for 1,500 if they could be fully utilized, but this situation has developed in regard to that matter: A number of ships that have been coming in have been required to be detained and the passengers taken off of them, and after being deloused detained for 12 days on account of exposure to typhus. In other cases it is sufficient to simply delouse the passengers and pass them on, but if the 1,500 beds were occupied there is not sufficient space to handle the delousing of these passengers that are going through. In other words, at least one-third of the dormitory space must be utilized as temporary barracks for the delousing of these people that are not going to be detained but simply deloused and passed on through. So that has cut down our barracks space practically to a capacity of 1,000 beds.

Further on Dr. Creel says:

This construction project would probably not be completed before next l. We anticipate a probable lull in the situation this summer—

That is owing to the immigration legislation recently enacted-

You might get a better understanding of the situation, Mr. Chairman, if I point out that most of the quarantine stations now under the control of the Government were taken over from the various city and State governments, and for the most part were constructed 20, 30, or 40 years ago. At the time they were established they were probably sufficient for the purposes, but there has been a considerable change since then. In 1890 if a transatlantic ship came to Boston with 500 immigrants it was considered to be a "bumper" load. Now we not infrequently have 2,000 at quarantine, and we have to take off the immigrants from the ships and crowd them into small space or hold up the ship. We had the steamship San Giusto arrive from Trieste with several cases of typhus. We did not have sufficient facilities for the isolation of those passengers ashore and they had to be held on the vessel in the stream. The result was that the steamship San Giusto and the steamship President Wilson had between them about 60 cases of typhus. If we had had the facilities for isolation on shore and adequate disinfecting equipment, it would not have been necessary to hold up the vessels nor would there have been so many secondary cases. The San Giusto was held up for 21 days. If we had had facilities on shore, we could have released the vessels. The entire quarantine procedure has been revolutionized. Formerly, if a vessel had cases of typhus or yellow fever or plague, it necessitated holding up that vessel until the disease apparently had burned itself out.

Last year 49,000 immigrants came in at Boston, and in pre-

Last year 49,000 immigrants came in at Boston, and in prewar times the average number of immigrants entering the port of Boston was 80,322.

Mr. President, I am not going into the other details, but there is no question that a large body of immigrants enter at the port of Boston, nor is there any doubt of the utter inadequacy of the protection against disease afforded by the present facilities there.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I feel satisfied that the committee will join me in asking to have the item restored, but I should like to ask if the Senator knows whether fees are collected there as they are in New York; and if so, if they are turned into the Treasury.

Mr. LODGE. Fees are collected at Boston, and last year they amounted to $48,000.

Mr. WARREN. Those fees go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts?

Mr. LODGE. I take it so. Mr. WARREN. I judge so. I desire to say while the subject is up that a little further on we will come to a provision contained in the House text of the bill, which reads as follows:

On and after July 1, 1921, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to promulgate such a schedule of fees to be charged vessels at each of the national quarantine stations as will be fair and reasonable for the services rendered by each station: Provided, That this authority shall not be applicable to any quarantine station where the fees are now fixed by law.

Mr. LODGE. They have been fixed at some stations, but not at all.

Mr. WARREN. They have been fixed at New York and Boston?

Mr. LODGE. I have read from the testimony that they are fixed at Boston and that there were collected there last year $48,000 in fees, paying more than half the expenses of the station. I sincerely hope the chairman of the committee and the Senate will consent that the amendment be disagreed to. The amount authorized by the House is moderate, and the need is very great indeed. My colleague, I know, has been informed about it as I have, and knows how great the need is there, and that we are asking nothing unreasonable in requesting that the House provision be left in the bill.

Mr. CALDER addressed the Chair.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me a moment, I am about to ask that the Senate disagree to the amendments as to the three quarantine station items; but I do not wish to cut off the Senator from New York or any other Senator who may desire to address the Senate in connection with them.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. Wads-WORTH | has so well covered the subject that I hesitate to occupy any time of the Senate to discuss it further, but I wish to have it appear in the RECORD that the commissioner of health of the city of New York has appealed to the Senators from the State of New York to assist in having this provision carried in the bill. The estimate of his department for the New York quarantine station was $740,000. I think all of that sum ought to have been allowed, but at least the $500,000 carried in the bill should be granted.

May I add, Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from Massachusetts has stated concerning receipts of quarantine stations, that for the month of March, the first month that the Federal Government had control of the station at New York, the receipts at that quarantine station were $118,000. The cost of maintaining it was $63,000. The profit of the station at the city of New York for the month of March was $60,000. The testimony indicates that if the barracks had been in condition, if we had provided for the things asked for in this bill, the profit would have been at least $30,000 more; so that in a very few months these things will all be paid for if these improvements and necessities are allowed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have had many telegrams on this subject, but this telegram from the mayor of Boston I think I ought to read so that it may be in the RECORD. He says

I ought to read so that it may be in the Record. He says:

I am amazed at press report that appropriation item of $150,000 for the quarantine station at Boston is to be eliminated. It is unnecessary for me to detail the natural advantages of the port of Boston. The facts which form the basis of the request for the appropriation were carefully collected by the national public health officials, the Department of Labor, and the Boston Chamber of Commerce. I trust that you and your colleague, Senator Walsh, will take immediate and appropriate action to have restored the item above referred to, so that New England business will not continue to suffer because of the Federal Government's failure to appropriate adequate quarantine facilities. facilities.

Andrew J. Peters, Mayor of Boston.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARREN. I ask to have the same action taken with regard to the two following amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 21, to strike

Baltimore, Md., Quarantine Station: For improvements, including chuliding of wharves, to continue available during the fiscal year rebuilding of 1922, $25,000.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 23, to strike out:

Boston, Mass., Quarantine Station: For improvements, including additional barracks, $150,000, to continue available during the fiscal year 1922.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head "Public buildings," on page 24, line 11, to increase the appropriation for operating supplies from $350,000 to $650,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public Health Service," on page 24, after line 22, to strike out:

On and after July 1, 1921, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to promulgate such a schedule of fees to be charged vessels at each of the national quarantine stations as will be fair and reasonable for the services rendered by each station: Provided, That this authority shall not be applicable to any quarantine station where the fees are now fixed by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have a committee amendment here that I wish to have inserted at this point, after line 4, on page 25.

VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Reading Clerk. On page 25, after line 4, it is proposed to insert the following:

Unexpended balances: Such amounts of the unexpended balances of the appropriations chargeable with the settlement of claims resulting from the suspension or termination of contracts or other procurement obligations of the War Department, consequent upon the suspension of hostilities, and with the adjustment of claims under the act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, shall remain upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of the respective appropriations and be available for similar purposes until June 30, 1922, and said amounts shall also be available for such personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere as in the discretion of the Secretary of War are necessary to properly protect the interests of the United States in making such settlements and adjustments: Provided, That no part of said amounts shall be used to pay any claims arising out of any contract or other obligation unless such contract or obligation was entered into subsequently to April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the Senator to let that amendment go over for a moment or two. I should like to read it. I could not catch its meaning from the reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over temporarily.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head "War Department," on page 26, after line 5, to insert:

Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park: For cost of examination and preparation of report upon the improvement and maintenance of the Government boulevard on Missionary Ridge, in the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park, as directed in an act approved February 2, 1921, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 11, to strike

Shiloh National Military Park: For continuing the establishment of the park, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922, $3,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this item, which is stricken out by the committee:

Shiloh National Military Park: For continuing the establishment of the park, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922, $3,000.

A member of the House Appropriations Committee told me this morning that the reason why this amount was put in by the House was that when the sundry civil bill was being considered by the House committee the committee was informed that a member of the Shiloh Park Board had died, and therefore that the amount of his salary, $3,000, would not have to be appropriated for the ensuing year, and that on the statement that the $3,000 salary had been included in this appropriation the committee reduced the sundry civil appropriation that much; but afterwards it was ascertained by the committee, as a result of proof before the House committee, that this salary did not come out of the sum appropriated for the Shiloh Park Commission under that item in the sundry civil bill, and therefore the House restored the amount, it not being the intention of the House to cut down the amount from what it was the last year. I wondered if those facts came before the Senator's committee; and if they did, can not this item be restored?

Mr. WARREN. It came before the committee and was considered, and there is perhaps an uncertainty on the subject. My remembrance of the affair, and that of the other members of the Senate committee, so far as I am informed, is that we undertook to cut the appropriation for that park for maintenance, as we did many others, to the extent of $3,000. At the same time and that was agreed to by both Houses-we provided that the death of the man receiving $3,000 should render this place vacant, and there seemed to be no necessity for filling it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that under the law it is provided that these places shall not be filled; but the point I make is that the salary of the park commissioner did not come out of the sundry civil appropriation, which was reduced erroneously on the theory that the salary of this park commissioner came out of it.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator's point is, Did we take out $3,000 twice where it was intended once? If the Senator is willing to let it go to conference, upon proof that it is taken out twice it certainly will be restored.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I hope the conferees will do that. I should very, very much prefer, though, if the Senator is willing, just to let the amendment be rejected. I hope he will do that; but if the Senator is not willing to do that—

Mr. WARREN. The point is that it takes it out of conference if I agree to that. If I should show to the House that the Senate was right, undoubtedly they would agree to it; but if the Senator is right, and his information is correct, certainly it will be restored.

Mr. McKELLAR. It will be restored in conference?

Mr. WARREN. It will. Mr. McKELLAR. That will be entirely satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 26, after line 15, to strike out:

Barracks and quarters, insular possessions: The unobligated balance of the appropriation for continuing construction of the necessary accommodations for the Seacoast Artillery and for temporary cantonments for overseas garrisons in the Philippine Islands, contained in the fortification appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921, is continued and made available for the same purposes until June 30, 1922.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 22, to strike out :

Engineer Department: The sum of $110,000 of the unexpended amount of the appropriation "Engineer operations in the field, 1919," shall remain upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of this appropriation until June 30, 1922, to permit payments to be made to the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. for searchlight mirrors under its contract therefor dated July 30, 1918.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Department of Justice," on page 27, after line 20, to strike out:

For the purchase of an automobile for the official use of the Attorney General, in exchange for old car now in use, $6,857.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that that amendment be rejected. The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this is an exceedingly small matter; but do I understand that the old car, when it is sold, involves turning the receipts into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts?

Mr. WARREN. I presume that in the trading which we have authorized heretofore in such matters of repairs and exchange, they would have liberty to turn in the old machine. I will say to the Senator that this old machine is an old Hudson, over 3 years old, and almost worthless.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was just wondering whether the $6,857 includes

Mr. SMOOT. That is the balance over whatever we get for

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head "United States courts," on page 29, after line 14, to strike out "For 1921, $150,000," so as to read:

For assistants to the Attorney General and to United States district attorneys employed by the Attorney General to aid in special cases, and for payment of foreign counsel employed by the Attorney General in special cases (such counsel shall not be required to take oath of office in accordance with section 366, Revised Statutes of the United States), to be available for expenditure in the District of Columbia, for the fiscal years that follow:

For 1919, $300.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to have that committee amendment rejected, on evidence that has come to the committee since it considered the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head "Postal Service," on page 33, after line 22, to insert:

OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL.

For the operation and maintenance of the aeroplane mail service between New York and San Francisco, including the same objects specified under this head in the Post Office appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921, $125,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, on page 35, line 9, I move to strike out the word "Navy" and insert the word "Treasury." The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Reading Clerk. On page 35, line 9, it is proposed to strike out the word "Navy" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Treasury," so that, if amended, it will read:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay to Mrs. T. E. S. Cates, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $63 for rent of quarters furnished to Lieuts. James E. Maher and L. E. Myers of the United States Navy while on submarine

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Department of the Interior," on page 37, after line 23, to strike out:

General Land Office: For additional employees during the fiscal year 1922 at annual rates of compensation as follows: Law examiners—2 at $2,000 each, 4 at $1,800 each, 10 at $1,600 each; 4 clerks at $1,400 each; in all, $32,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, at the end of line 15, to strike out "$5,000" and to insert "$10,156," so as to read:

PUBLIC LANDS SERVICE.

FOR the protection of the so-called Oregon & California Railroad lands and Coos Bay Wagon Road lands: To enable the Secretary of the Interior, with the cooperation of the Secretary of Agriculture or otherwise, as in his judgment may be most advisable, to establish and maintain a patrol to prevent trespass and to guard against and check fires upon the lands revested in the United States by the act approved June 9, 1916, and the lands known as the Coos Bay Wagon Road lands involved in the case of Southern Oregon Co. v. United States (No. 2711, in the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Ninth Circuit), $10,156.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 15, to strike

For furniture and filing cases, $10,000, to continue available during the fiscal year 1922.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 18, to strike out:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Animal Industry," on page 42, line 21, after the word "cattle," to strike out "to be"; and in line 22, after the word "during," to strike out "the remainder of," so as to read:

General expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry: To enable the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, to perform the duties imposed upon it by the Agricultural appropriation act approved May 31, 1920, for the payment of indemnities on account of cattle slaughtered during the current fiscal year, in connection with the eradication of tuberculosis from animals, $405,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 43, to insert:

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to pay to Peter G. Ten Eyck, from the appropriation "Meat inspection, Bureau of Animal Industry, 1921," the sum of $84, representing rent remaining unpaid by the Department of Agriculture for the use and occupancy of a room in the Spencer-Trask Building, Albany, N. Y., from and including November 1, 1920, to February 28, 1921, the provisions of section 114 of the Penal Code notwithstanding.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhend "Forest Service," on page 43, after line 12, to strike out:

Olympic National Forest: The unexpended balance of the appropriation of $100,000 for emergency expenditures incident to the disposal of wind-thrown and intermingled or adjoining timber on the Olympic National Forest and for emergency measures necessary to protect from fire the timber on the Olympic National Forest, made in the deficiency appropriation act approved March 1, 1921, is reappropriated and made available for the same purposes during the fiscal year 1922.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 44, to strike

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to pay all necessary expenses, including labor and material, involved in consolidating the addressing, duplicating, and mailing work of the Department of Agriculture in the District of Columbia, $5,000, to remain available during the fiscal year 1922.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, on page 44, line 15, I move that the dollar sign be inserted before the numerals "5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Department of Commerce," on page 44, line 15, after the numerals "$5,000," to strike out "to continue available during the fiscal year 1922," so as to read:

To enable the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to investigate and report on domestic as well as foreign problems relating to the production, distribution, and marketing in so far as they relate to the important export industries of the United States, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and all necessary incidental expenses connected therewith, fiscal year 1922, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, after line 8, to strike

BUREAU OF STANDARDS.

The sum of $250,000 of the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the Bureau of the Census for the fiscal year 1922 is transferred to the Bureau of Standards and made available during that fiscal year for the following purposes and in the following amounts, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, after line 14, to strike

For continuation of the investigation of structural materials, such as stone, clays, cement, etc., including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, after line 18, to strike out:

For technical investigations in cooperation with the industries upon fundamental problems involved in industrial development following the war, with a view to assisting in the permanent establishment of the new American industries developed during the war, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 47, to strike out:

To enable the Bureau of Standards to cooperate with Government departments, engineers, and manufacturers in the establishment of standards, methods of testing, and inspection of instruments, equipment, tools, and electrical and mechanical devices used in the industries and by the Government, including the practical specification for quality and performance of such devices, and the formulation of methods of inspection, laboratory, and service tests, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Department of Labor," on page 47, after line 10, to insert:

IMMIGRATION SERVICE.

For enforcement of the laws regulating the immigration of aliens into the United States, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921, $488,-$31.53.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Legislative," on page 48, after line 4, to insert:

The statement of appropriations, etc., for the third session of the Sixty-sixth Congress shall include the Army, naval, and second deficiency appropriation acts passed during the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, and all other appropriations made at the latter session shall be compiled and published with the statement of appropriations for the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, after line 17, to insert: SENATE.

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay from the appropriation, "For compensation of officers, clerks, messengers, and others" for the fiscal year 1921, to Austin Jackson for services rendered as assistant clerk to the Hon. Tasker L. Oddie, Senator from the State of Nevada, at the rate of $1,500 per annum from March 4, 1921, to March 20, 1921, both dates inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I offer the amendment which I send to the

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Reading Clerk. On page 48, after line 25, insert the following:

Contingent expenses: For maintaining, exchanging, and equipping motor vehicles for carrying the mails and for official use of the office of the Secretary and Sergeant at Arms, $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

For fuel, oil, cotton waste, and advertising, exclusive of labor, $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 49, to insert:

Holidays: To enable the Public Printer to comply with the provisions of the law granting holidays and the Executive order granting holidays with pay to the employees of the Government Printing Office, $16,883.63.

The amendment was agreed to. Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amend-

The Reading Clerk. On page 50, after line 19, insert the following:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to transfer, without payment therefor, to the Government Printing Office one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this brings up one of the questions which the Military Affairs Committee has been struggling with for two years. The committee, in reporting the Army appropriation bill, struck out a provision which the House had inserted for the transfer of six motor trucks to the Department of the Interior. The Senator has now offered an amendment to transfer one motor truck to the Government Printing Office. I would like to say to the Senator from Wyoming that the Army is now short 1,500 trucks, contrary to the usual assumption.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will notice that this happens to be a passenger-carrying vehicle.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are also short 489 passenger-carrying vehicles.

Mr. WARREN. That is the kind they want. Mr. WADSWORTH. They will take any kind they can get, if you give them to them for nothing.

Mr. WARREN. How many are they short? The Senator is providing in his bill to sell some.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Ten thousand trucks and two thousand passenger vehicles. Of course, one truck is not going to make a great deal of difference, but the Military Affairs Committee has laid down a straight law on this subject, to govern itself, of course, not to govern the Senate, that the War Department will not distribute free of charge any more trucks, because it absolutely has not the trucks to distribute. I can not help making this little protest, although it is only one truck.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say to the Senator from New York, who will soon have charge of the Army appropriation bill on the floor, that this matter of motors and automobiles has been a troublesome one to me, and I succeeded in having the Committee on Appropriations take steps to stop any of these motor vehicles being turned over to any department of the Government unless paid for at their value; and as to the others, that they should sell them, as they are now proposing to do. We put it into an appropriation bill, but nobody made a point of order and it went through.

One morning some weeks later I did not happen to go to the meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs and that committee took up the matter and immediately reported a provision to repeal that law. So we are right where we were before, and these motors have been given away by the thousands, not singly but by thousands, to the Post Office Department and the Agricultural Department. It is all wrong, of course. But this one, it seemed to me, to be used by the Government itself for its own particular purposes, did not make it very much worse. So I hope the amendment will be agreed to. I am not sure they will get the car. I hope that when the Senator brings in his appropriation bill he will authorize the sale of these vehicles.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator think this should be confined to a passenger-carrying motor vehicle which is surplus? The amendment reads as follows:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to transfer, without payment therefor—

Of course, that always goes in, "without payment therefor " to the Government Printing Office one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle.

That is mandatory upon the Secretary of War. They are short 489. This will make them short 490.

Mr. WARREN. Not if the Senator amends it as I have asked

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will be perfectly frank with the Sena-r. If you put in the phrase "which is surplus and not needed," it will be a car that would not travel at all, because that is all they have left, junk.

Mr. WARREN. How many thousands are there remaining?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just about 4,000 of different kinds of motor vehicles. I shall not object to this, but I simply wanted to say that I did not want it as a precedent when the Army bill is taken up.

Mr. KING. This bill, as I recall, carries provisions for the transfer of quite a number of vehicles in the same way, all of which would be subtracted from the War Department.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wish the Senator would call my attention to the provisions.

Mr. KING. I have one in mind for the Alien Property Custodian, and there are quite a number which I do not carry in my mind now. I am sure there must be half a dozen or more which this bill attempts to dispose of and wrench from the control of the department with which the Senator is so closely identified.

WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the appetite for these cars is something astounding. Word goes around that the War Department has some cars, and everybody immediately wants them for nothing, and one department chief will call on me and say "Can't you direct the Secretary of War to give me six cars, just give them to me?" The Post Office Department sent me a letter this morning asking that they be given 2,000 cars for nothing. This is just for one car for the Government Printing Office. I understand the Alien Property Custodian is going to get in on this.

Mr. KING. The Civil Service Commission gets one, as will

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, they are on a higher plane than other officials, and perhaps they ought to be treated differently

Mr. McKELLAR. Is not that a division of the spoils of war among all of the departments?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The trouble is that the War Department can not deliver them when it is short such a large number.

I agree with the Senator about it. Mr. McKELLAR.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Wyoming how many cars this bill takes away from the War Department mandatorily?

I should say four or five, possibly six. Mr. WARREN.

Mr. SMOOT. Two.
Mr. WARREN. I am speaking now of the one here, then there were two in the first part of the bill, and I understand one toward the end.

Mr. KING. I suggest to the Senator from New York that he move to reconsider the provision relating to the Civil Service Commission. I think under his statement we ought not to enact legislation which takes from the War Department those cars which it needs. It would simply mean that the War Department will ask for appropriations to go out and purchase new trucks and new cars, and we will be expending much more than we otherwise would expend.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is exactly what will happen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. KING. Let the amendment be stated again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Assistant Secretary. On page 50, after line 19, insert the following words:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to transfer, without payment therefor, to the Government Printing Office one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle.

Mr. KING. I think that we should vote that down, in the light of the statement of the Senator from New York, and that the chairman of the committee ought to join in the request.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move to amend that amendment by adding the words "if such vehicle can be furnished from surplus stores not needed by the War Department.

Mr. SMOOT. I think if we are going to defeat it at all we had better defeat it right out, and take it out of the bill, rather than accept an amendment which we really know would defeat it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think there was some surplus, and that probably it would be all right to accept the amendment.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator from New York, in view of what the Senator from Tennessee just said, if there is any question about the War Department needing all of the motor vehicles they now have?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is not the slightest question.
Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator from New York will bear me out in the statement I made, that there are a number of vehicles declared surplus which must be disposed of by July 1, as I recall. Is that correct? Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely suggested to the Senator from Utah that perhaps the amendment as amended by the Senator from New York will carry out his purpose, because I am not sure that the whole number has yet been disposed of. I do not know whether they have been or not. Has the Senator from New York any information on that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; but nearly all have been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, has the Senator from Wyoming any objection to recurring to page 2, while we are talking about automobiles, to the provision found in lines 24, 25, and 26, authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer to the Civil Service Commission a vehicle, so that I may offer to that provision, in order that we may be consistent, an amendment similar to that just adopted by the Senate with respect to the provision relating to the Government Printing Office?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from New York is right about it, and it really would mean a machine that would be of no service, it would simply leave the Civil Service Commission, from whom we constantly ask advice, and who heartily favor us, with no car at all, and they have asked for only one.

Mr. KING. I think they do better service if they do not

Mr. WARREN. Possibly so; but if they are compelled to walk instead of ride we shall have to have more clerks.

The whole thing has gotten almost to the degree of the The whole transaction and the whole origin and the whole matter of the treatment of the automobiles has been a will-o'-the-wisp for the different departments to chase after. Mr. WADSWORTH. I agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. WARREN. To say that the Civil Service Commission, which really has Senators as well as Representatives politically in its pocket as to power, can not have one puny little automobile, when the Post Office Department and the Department of Agriculture have had many thousands of automobiles and trucks, is a matter the Senator must determine for himself. If the Senator is really vindictive enough, although he never seems that way, to desire to impose upon the Civil Service Commission, I shall not contest it; but I am sorry he feels that he ought to offer the amendment.

Mr. KING. Having such high regard for the civil service, I offer the amendment. I think it will do better service without the automobile than with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. Mr. WARREN. I am not objecting to reconsideration of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary. Add at the end of the amendment, on page 2, after the word "vehicle," in line 26, the words "if such vehicle can be obtained from surplus stores not needed by the War Department," so the amendment as amended will read:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to transfer, without payment therefor, to the Civil Service Commission one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle, if such vehicle can be obtained from surplus stores not needed by the War Department.

Mr. WARREN. Now, let me ask, while we have an abundant attendance of Senators, that when the Senator from New York [Mr. Wadsworth] brings before the Senate the Army appropriation bill and proposes to close this whole automobile matter, as I understand he does, Senators will all vote with him and see that the matter is passed beyond this absolutely ridiculous and ludicrous position in which we have been in connection with this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to, and the amendment as amended is agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public printing and binding," on page 50, after line 23, to strike out:

For printing and binding for the Smithsonian Institution, including $5,000 for the annual reports of the American Historical Association, $41,702.70, to continue available during the fiscal year 1922.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, after line 13, to strike

For printing and binding for the Department of Agriculture, $125,000, to continue available during the fiscal year 1922.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Judgments, United States courts," on page 53, after line 2, to insert:

For payment of the judgments rendered against the United States by the United States District Court for the Eastern District of South Carolina and certified to Congress by the Attorney General in Senate Document No. 17 of the present session, $440,000, together with a sufficient sum to pay interest thereon at the legal rate per annum from May 3, 1921, to the date this appropriation is made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask what that judgment was?

Mr. WARREN. That is a judgment in settlement of accounts. Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator happen to remember whether this involves the land upon which the Army supply base at Charleston is situated?

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] if he can give us that information. The judgment is for $440,000.

Mr. GLASS. They were consent judgments.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was asking, may I say to the Senator from Virginia, whether the $440,000 was to cover the payment for land upon which stands, in part at least, the Army supply base at Charleston.

Mr. GLASS. I think that is what it is for. I will say to the Senator that I have not a great deal of familiarity with it, further than to know that these are consent judgments, judgments agreed to by the Government, and it has been usual always to include those in the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I will say that it does cover the There were several judgments; not one, but land referred to.

three judgments in all, I think.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will look on page 2 of the document which he has in his hand, he will see the information given there, I believe.

Mr. DIAL. These were consent judgments entered by the court.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not question the obligation of the United States in this case, but I wish to ask the chairman or some other member of the committee whether or not this completes the purchase of land upon which the Charleston supply base is built?

Mr. WARREN. I am not able to tell the Senator. Perhaps one of the Senators from South Carolina can tell him.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Because if it does, it ends the chapter of what, in my judgment, has been one of the most extraordinary expenditures resulting in the most useless facility for the Government that has come out of the war. I only hope it is the last of them. I think we spent $16,000,000 in building the Army supply base at Charleston, part of it upon land which was not paid for. The amount appropriated in this item is in payment of a judgment for it. Sixteen million dollars' worth of docks and buildings stand there and not one ton of supplies was ever shipped from that place or ever can be.

Mr. DIAL. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon! Mr. WADSWORTH. This is even higher up the river than

Mr. DIAL. It is a little above the navy yard. A great deal of shipping has been carried on from there. There were 50,000 soldiers landed at that place when they came back from France, so my friend from New York is entirely mistaken about that. To further answer the question, my information is that there is one other small judgment involved there. Whether there are any more or not I do not know. I think there is one very small judgment yet to come in.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think the committee had sufficient ground upon which to base this, aside from the judgment of the court, but the statement of the Senator from New York is another evidence of the fact that conditions down in that section of the country are not even understood, because they are not thoroughly investigated. I think that in the transportation of the troops from abroad to this country, taking into consideration the number and the time of their disembarkation there, the record was broken at Charleston. Ships drawing the maximum depth that that channel would allow were brought in, the soldiers were disembarked, unloaded on the magnificent terminals that had been furnished by the Government, and distributed to the different sections of the country from which they came, all in less time and at less expense than at any other place on the entire Atlantic seaboard.

In addition to that, I wish to say that vast tons of supplies were handled through those terminals, as the records will disclose. It was the remount station as well.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Before the armistice?

Mr. SMITH. Yes: before the armistice.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is news to me. Mr. SMITH. The Senator should look up the record.

addition to that the Senator said this is even farther up than the navy yard. A committee of experts located the navy yard where it was because the docks and the city were only 7 miles from the open sea, and on account of the magnificent conformation of that bay and the two estuaries, the Cooper and the Ashley Rivers. They had their choice of sites clear up to where they put it, and they put it at that point to be out of the range of the big guns that naval vessels might carry, where the yard would be landlocked and away from the danger of assault. According to every admiral who has studied the situation it has no superior on the whole Atlantic seaboard.

We could legislate here for the interests of the country at large with a great deal more benefit to the country if we would study the resources of the country as a whole and not look at it from a sectional standpoint.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Curtis in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. We have a couple of other judgments, it seems, and in connection with them I offer the amendment which I now send to the desk.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question regarding the item passed on page 51, for printing and binding for the Agricultural Department? Does that appear anywhere else, or does this do away with it entirely?

Mr. WARREN. That is simply transferred, and we will come to it later in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary. On page 53, after line 9, insert the following:

For payment of the judgment rendered against the United States by the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Vir-ginia sitting in admiralty, and certified to Congress by the Attorney General in Senate Documents Nos. 31 and 32 of the present session, under the Navy Department, $35,233.93.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Judgments, Court of Claims," on page 53, line 13, after the numeral "77," to insert "and Senate Document No. 26," so as to read:

For payment of the judgments rendered by the Court of Claims and reported to Congress during the present session in House Document No. 77 and Senate Document No. 26, namely:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 16, to increase the appropriation for payment of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims under the War Department from "$13,463.68" to "$157,071."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 18, to increase the total for payment of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims from "$17,579.46" to "$161,186.78."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, after line 3, to insert the following additional section:

AUDITED CLAIMS.

SEC. 3. That for the payment of the following claims, certified to be due by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, and under appropriations heretofore treated as permanent, being for the service of the fiscal year 1918 and prior years, unless otherwise stated, and which have been certified to Congress under section 2 of the act of July 7, 1884, as fully set forth in Senate Document No. 27, reported to Congress at its present session, there is appropriated as follows:

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the chairman of the committee to lines 21, 22, and 23 on page 66, the first item of contingencies $31,594.72, then for pay of Army $25,809, and then an item for arrears; on the next page for supplies, services, and transportation $1,811; also the item in line 4, page 67, for engineer depots $15,282.47. May I inquire how it is that these large amounts are presented at this time? Are they for deficits of preceding years?

Mr. WARREN. They are, and I think I can explain in a few words. Some departments of the Government, for instance, the War Department, have accounts that are for indebtedness incurred at a very distant point and it takes months Some departments of the Government, for inbefore these accounts get to headquarters. In the meantime the committees have reported and Congress has passed the appropriations for the year. July 1 comes and there are a few thousand dollars left in a given account; that sum goes back into the Treasury, but the voucher is later received and is perfectly correct. The indebtedness was incurred during the year for which the money was appropriated; the money has been appropriated with which to meet it; but, under the law, it has gone back into the Treasury. Then come these audited claims, which have for us the same or nearly the same significance as the judgment of the court.

The Senator will find before we conclude the consideration of the bill a matter of sixty-odd thousand dollars, as I recall, of audited claims under the Post Office Department.
auditor of that department has been there for a long time and has taken care of his duties in a very satisfactory manner. So far as I recall, in all the years that I have known of his service he has never asked for a deficiency until this year.
The reason for that has been that heretofore he could calculate from the run of the accounts, how much the expenditures at distant points would be, and, while the accounts would not come in until the year following, they were calculated for in the year for which the appropriations were made.
    Now, however, comes the budget bill that does away with all of the auditors and provides for a comptroller to handle the matter. These items embrace various accounts which are perfectly lawful and for which there is money left from the 1921 appropriation. Again, the existence of certain conditions has this year caused an increased expenditure in that department, as in the case of the telephone, for instance. The departments have had their former contracts, and their instruments have been placed; but the Public Utilities Commission has come along and increased the charges by a considerable percentage. Of course, these audited claims have to be paid. They are always examined, and I think, with one or two exceptions, we have never found anything but a very correct statement of accounts under the law.
```

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, we come now to the emergency appropriations, beginning on page 75, and I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to what is being done in the way of increases in the clerical force for the ensuing year. Our good friends on the other side of the aisle have had a great deal to say about economy, but I find that there are provided for in the pending bill 580 clerks additional to those previously employed. In some of these cases, as in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the clerks' salaries are increased. There are, I think, as nearly as I can figure, 138 or 140 additional clerks.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? Mr. McKELLAR. In just one moment. The total additional amount for clerk hire appropriated in the bill, according to the figures that I have hastily made while we were considering it. is $300,790.

Now I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, I do not want to interrupt the Senator, if he wishes to make a speech.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be delighted to yield to the Senator. I am not going to make a speech.

Mr. WARREN. But the statement the Senator makes is entirely erroneous.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I should like to have it corrected to whatever extent it is erroneous.

Mr. WARREN. I shall be very glad to correct the Senator as we go along, but I will correct the Senator now far enough to say, in view of his remarks as to the War Risk Bureau, that there is not a single clerk added in that bureau, Mr. McKELLAR. I will make that exception, but the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. WARREN. Then, coming to the Treasury proper, there is not a single clerk added there nor a single dollar more of salary, except, as stated the other day, for those who are put into the office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to read from the bill, if the Senator will merely permit me.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt right there, I desire to say that practically we are not adding any clerks in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. WARREN. Really we are not.
Mr. GLASS. I say "practically."
Mr. WARREN. We are not doing so in this bill; and that is where the Senator from Tennessee makes his mistake. This bill looks as though we were making additions; but as a matter of fact, we are simply providing in the bill for clerks who have been taken away from some other place.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I can very easily show how clearly mistaken the chairman of the committee is about this matter. We have made appropriations for all the departments for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1922; those bills have all gone through. The appropriations to which I refer in the pending bill are emergency appropriations for clerk hire. I find that for the State Department in this bill there is appropriated $57,820; for the Treasury Department there are items of $10,000, $12,000, $16,610, $11,380, $4,800, $24,300; in the comptroller's office there are items of $37,880 and $14,800; in the General Land Office there is an item of $65,600; in the Bureau of Fisheries there are items for $2,500, $5,000, and $5,970; in the Department of Commerce there are items for $12,000 and $2,100; in the Civil Service Commission there is an item of $3,000; in the Rent Commission there is an item of $15,000; or a total—I do not claim to be absolutely accurate, for I have made my calculations very hastily while we were considering the bill—of $300,790 for clerk hire which is appropriated in the bill over and above what has already been appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922.

I call attention to this fact for the purpose of showing just what is being done. It may be necessary, according to the views of the majority, for they have control and they are going to pass the bill. The only thing that I can do is to call attention to it. I do not think, however, we ought to be told very much about Republican economy when we are increasing the number of clerks—and nearly every one of them is to be employed here in Washington—and are increasing the appropriation for clerk hire $300,790.

Let me call attention to an article from the New York Herald of to-day. I am not going to read the whole article, but I am going to ask unanimous consent to make it a part of my marks because I should like to have it go in the RECORD. I do wish to call attention to the following statement from the article:

One of the greatest abuses of public funds is in the bewildering maze of Government activities purporting to aid soldiers who have fought in the war. Because it is possible on sentimental grounds to put through appropriations for such activities, hundreds of thousands of dollars are thrown away in the duplication of services by boards and bureaus, with the net result that the soldiers actually do not get anything like the benefit they would receive if the expenditures were cut in half and the money efficiently administered under some central authority.

But there are numerous other activities having nothing to do with war work, and these bureaus and boards are scattered throughout the Government departments. Their personnel runs into the thousands, but the cost of their operations far exceeds the sums paid in salaries. They are appropriated for not only directly but indirectly, and it is therefore impossible to trace their expenses except in a limited number of cases. How they account for many millions of dollars can be seen from the size of the sundry civil appropriation bill and the legislative appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1922, compared with 1914.

Sundry civil Legislative.	 	 $384,196,760 110,345,018	$106,749,532 35,172,434
	2000	 494, 541, 778	141,921,966

I call the special attention of my friends on the other side to this article appearing in one of their own party papers of to-day, the New York Herald:

These two bills embrace appropriations that can not be included under other heads, but as a general rule they provide for the payment of personnel. Actual expenses of bureau and board operations are provided in other bills, although these two carry some such provisions. The net increase in the amounts carried by the two bills in 1922 is $353,000,000 over the 1914 figures.

Then I call the especial attention of the Senators to the way in which it is done, as it is set out in this article. I do not know who wrote the article; that fact does not appear on its face; but, as I have stated, it is published in the New York Herald, and it is well worthy of the careful consideration of every Member of the Senate, and especially of my Republican friends, who are advocating economy but are not practicing it. I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be incorporated in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNary in the chair).

Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Herald, Thursday, June 2, 1921.]

EXAMAZING WASTE IN USELESS BUREAUS—EXPERTS FIND CHANCES FOR UNITED STATES TO RETRENCH AND IMPROVE SERVICE—MAY REACH A BILLION—NEW ACTIVITIES COST MORE THAN ENTIRE GOVERNMENT OUTGO BEFORE THE WAR—AX SIMPLY MUST BE USED—LARGE SUMS LOST IN DUPLICATION OF INEFFECTUAL EFFORTS TO AID VETS.

[Herewith is published another of the series of articles by the New York Herald, including the present-day expenses of the Washington Government and the problems of taxation. The articles will be continued through this week.]

[Special dispatch to the New York Herald.]

[Special dispatch to the New York Herald.]

New York Herald Bureau,
Washington, D. C., June 1.

Where Government begins and where it ends is a question which if properly answered would help roll up savings of hundreds of millions of dollars in the swollen Federal expenditures which at present are kept at an abnormal figure by the thousands of political bloodsuckers attached to the public pay roll. The war furnished an excuse for starting innumerable bureaus and commissions under the Government, and now, almost three years after the armistice, fully half a billion and possibly as much as a billion dollars a year still flows out of the Public Treasury to keep up these war activities.

One of the greatest abuses of public funds is in the bewildering maze of Government activities purporting to aid soldiers who fought in the war. Because it is possible on sentimental grounds to put through appropriations for such activities, hundreds of thousands of dollars are thrown away in the duplication of services by boards and bureaus, with the net result that the soldiers actually do not get anything like the benefit they would receive if the expenditures were cut in half and the money efficiently administered under some central authority.

But there are numerous other activities baring pothing to do with in half and the money efficiently administered under some central authority.

But there are numerous other activities having nothing to do with war work, and these bureaus and boards are scattered throughout the Government departments. Their personnel runs into the thousands, but the cost of their operations far exceeds the sums paid in salaries. They are appropriated for not only directly but indirectly, and it is therefore impossible to trace their expenses except in a limited number of cases. How they account for many millions of dollars can be seen from the size of the sundry civil appropriation bill and the legislative appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1922, compared with 1914:

	1922	1914
Sundry civil	$384, 196, 760 110, 345, 018	$106, 749, 532 35, 172, 431
	491, 511, 778	141,921,936

CHIEFLY PERSONNEL PAYMENTS.

These two bills embrace appropriations that can not be included under other heads, but as a general rule they provide for the payment of personnel. Actual expenses of bureau and board operations are provided in other bills, although these two carry some such provisions,

The net increase in the amounts carried by the two bills in 1922 is $353,000,000 over the 1914 figure. So far as it is possible to segregate the various appropriations and compare them, the following table shows where the increases come in:

The balance of the increase of $353,000,000 in these two bills is contained in various minor appropriations carried in such a way as to make it impossible to compare them with the 1914 bill. It should be understood that the bureaus and commissions supported by the above appropriations also draw funds from other bills and other departments. For instance, the Public Health Service, besides the elaborate funds provided above, is specially considered in the section of the sundry civil bill setting apart funds for the Panama Canal. In that section an additional $850,000 is set apart for the use of the Health Service.

SHOWS ONLY PART OF FUNDS.

The Air Service has an appropriation under the military act for $33,000,000. War Risk, in addition to the above, is authorized to obtain further funds under the Treasury bill. Special authorization for almost all the other activities are contained in one or another of the departmental bills, so the above increase of $304,325,360 shows only part of what is spent. It is estimated that from $300,000,000 to $700,000,000 additional is obtained under other bills to keep these boards and bureaus in operation.

There is no specific way to reduce these expenditures except to go at them with an ax and hack them down to something like their proper level. This is not a simple task. Neither is it an impossible one, Here, as in the Army and Navy appropriations, and in fact in nearly every one of the appropriation bills, there are political obstacles to combat. But the astounding increase in extra governmental activities makes it imperative that political considerations take second place to economy.

makes it imperative that political considerations take second place to economy.

In 1914 the total cost of running the Government was $1,000,000,000,000. Of this amount $700,000,000 was devoted to the primary functions of the Government and was expended on the legislative, executive, judicial, diplomatic, public works, development, and educational activities. In 1922 the Government will spend at least $5,000,000,000, and of this sum only about the same amount as in 1914 will be devoted to the Government's primary functions. The balance of more than $4,000,000,000, after deducting $1,000,000,000 for interest on the public debt, another billion for special obligations growing out of the war, and still another billion for Army and Navy, will still leave a full billion for activities which the Government, even in 1914 when a surplus of cash was available, would not have thought of taking up.

There is no denying the truth that government is an experiment and that it must keep pace with the times. This statement was made by Representative Good, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, to explain the continuance of so many boards and bureaus whose present usefulness is far outweighed by the need for economy. Mr. Good has the unenviable job of trying to reduce appropriations, and it is only natural that he should have found an explanation for the cuts he was not able to make in the face of great political opposition and lacking the solid support of the public. But even if government is an experiment, there seems to be no plausible reason, so far as can be judged from actual results, for extending the experiment in these times so that the cost of new activities is as much as the whole cost of the Government before the war.

Mr. McKELLAR. Everybody knows that the war necessi-

Mr. McKELLAR. Everybody knows that the war necessitated the employment of many more employees than are necessary in peace times; some have been separated from the service; but we are providing in this bill for 140 more, and if we count those in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, for 580 more.

The bill also proposes to increase the salaries of some of those in the War Risk Insurance Bureau. While salaries and wages are going down all over the country and the products of the farm are selling at a vastly reduced price, our good friends on the other side are raising the salaries of Government employees and adding to the number of employees already working for the Government.

It may be right, but I do not agree to it; I do not subscribe to it. I wish it were so that I could prevent it; but we are in the minority and there is no chance of preventing it. Our Republican friends are going to carry it through. I do not, however, want to hear any more talk about economy. At any rate, if we hear it we must take it with a grain of allowance when we find that instead of economizing they are adding to the expenditures of the Government right along; as, for instance, in this bill, by an appropriation of over $300,000 for more clerk hire for the year 1922.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say in passing that it is all well enough for our Democratic friends to make statements such as that the Senator from Tennessee has just made. The statement made by him is not based upon the facts in the case, however, but upon what he thinks the facts to be.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Utah takes issue with my statement, I will ask the Senator if he will allow me to in-

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will wait until I get through, he may ask me any question he desires,

Mr. McKELLAR. But the Senator has just made a statement that is not fair. I have read from the bill which has been reported out of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator to wait a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah refuses to yield at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will tell the Senator that the statement he has made does not conform to the facts in the case.

The Senator says that we are not decreasing the number of employees in the departments, but increasing them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no, Mr. President. Now, the Senator has misrepresented my position. I never made any such statement as that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?
Mr. SMOOT. Then what was the Senator talking about the increasing of employees for?

Mr. McKELLAR. I said that this bill provided for 138 additional clerks and an additional clerk hire of $300,000 over and above what was appropriated for 1922. I ask the Senator from Utah if that is not a fact?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; even that is not a fact. We have had a very, very unwise and indefensible practice in this Government of late of detailing employees out of one department into another. I have complained of it time and time again upon the floor of the Senate.

We find that as high as 67 employees have been detailed from different departments of the Government to another department of the Government. I never believed in it. I have criticized it in the past and we have stopped it in this bill; and as far as I am concerned, if it does not cease from now on, I am going to introduce a bill and see if it can not be put through Congress preventing such a thing being done.

There is no need of my standing here and telling the Senate the numbers that have been detailed in the different departments. One of the cases was referred to by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] yesterday, in the comptroller's office. Many of the employees in the Water Power Commission were detailed to that commission in the past. In fact, the only appropriation that was made for some time was for the engineer in charge and general expenses, and many employees under him were detailed from some other department. I took the position a year ago that wherever there was a detail made from any department in this Government we would cut out that many employees from that particular department, and that we would give them only the employees that worked within the depart-

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, have you done that in this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what this bill is for, and that is what a great many of these employees are for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Have you cut them out, I mean?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; we have cut them out, and there are to be none detailed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know; but you gave notice a year ago that if they were detailed you were going to cut out that many Have you cut them out in this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. We cut them out in the legislative appropriation bill as it passed at the last session of Congress, but we did not provide in that bill for employees to take the place of the other employees that were prevented from further detail.

I will say to the Senator that I know that the employees of the Government have not been decreased as fast as they ought to have been

Mr. McKELLAR. I am greatly obliged to the Senator for that admission.

I am perfectly willing to say that; and I want Mr. SMOOT. to say again what I have said upon the floor of the Senate so many times, that they never will be decreased as long as we will appropriate for them.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to be confirmed by the Senator. Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that in October last there was a decrease in the number of employees of the Government here in the District of Columbia of 516. month of December there was a decrease of 956. In the month of January of this year there was a decrease of 513. In the month of March there was a decrease of 611. In the month of April there was a decrease of 680. I wish it were twice that number; and let me say to the Senator now that for the month of June and for the month of July he will find out that the decrease will be over a thousand each month. It will be over 1,000, or 2,000 for the months of June and July, and I hope that it will be continued right along until instead of eighty-odd thouand employees in the District we will have them down to 50,000 or 60,000, and that is ample to do the work in the Dis-

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in order that there may not be any doubt at all about the facts, I am going to read some of these clerks that are provided for. I do not want to have any dispute about the facts.

I call attention first to No. 1, the Undersecretary of the Treasury, page 82.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know what the Undersecretary is? The Undersecretary provided for here is to take the place of two Secretaries that we have in the past made appropriations for.

Mr. McKELLAR. What I am complaining of is that all the appropriation bills for 1922, except the military appropriation bill, have been passed. All these matters have been passed upon and fixed by this Congress or the last Congress. This is an additional appropriation for clerk hire or secretary hire, the first one, and that is what I am saying-that it is increasing the appropriations that we have already made for the next year.

I continue to read:

No. 2 is the commissioner of public debt. No. 3 is the commissioner of accounts and deposits.

Then, again, in the Division of Deposits, No. 4 is the chief of division, $3,500.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator say that that is in addition to the employees already provided for?

Mr. McKELLAR. I say that it is an additional salary to employees. This money has not been appropriated before. this bill is not passed, it will not provide for the payment of this salary to this employee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what is the use of my standing here upon the floor of the Senate and correcting the Senator when he positively says here that it is an additional number of employees to that which was appropriated for before? This is nothing but simply a transfer of the account to pay employees individually provided for instead of a lump sum.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, where is that lump sum taken out of the funds already appropriated? I ask the Senator just to explain where it is. The Senator can explain it. He knows it. Where is it taken out? Is it taken from the other appropriation? The Senator does not reply. Why, the Senator knows that these clerks provided here are in addition to the clerks that we have now, and there can not be any doubt about it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not know any such thing, and the money will never go out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. I read where we appropriated it out of the Treasury of the United States. If it does not go out of the Treasury of the United States, it will be because the House of Representatives does not agree to it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President-

Mr. McKELLAR. I am counting now. I made a statement about this matter, and I am just counting up the number, if the Senator will pardon me.

There is the Chief of the Division of Deposits, $3,500; assistant chief of division, $2,500; clerks—one $2,250, one $2,000, one $1,800, one $1,600, one $1,400; messenger, $840; assistant messenger, $720; in all, $16,610.

That is on page 83.

Division of Printing and Stationery: Clerks-one $1,400, one $1,200, one $1,000, one $900; multigraph operators—one $1,200, one $1,000; skilled laborer, $840; four laborers, at $720 each; two messenger boys, at $480 each; in all, $11,380 additional appropriated out of the Treasury.

The appropriations have been made for these departments, Here are specific clerks provided for. Here are specific amounts appropriated for. They are additional appropriations from the

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will yield

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that the Senator wants to speak from the record, and so forth; but a moment ago he spoke about an appropriation in a lump sum to pay these men in the Treasury Department. Here is $12,456,000 appropriated for taking care of the expense of loans during the year 1921; and, of course, it expires on the 30th of this month, and the men who were employed under that lump sum-the lump sum is not again appropriated—have to be placed under some other line of appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Ah! Now the Senator admits what I have said. He said that these lump-sum appropriations have not been made. The Congress has heretofore made all the appropriations that were necessary for 1922, and the result is that certain clerks in the various departments want to be retained there, and in order to be retained there they have to have money appropriated for them. The Senator talks about paying this money out of lump-sum appropriations. I call his attention to the very first section of the bill, in which-

The following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

It does not come out of lump sums at all. It comes out of the Treasury of the United States. It is in addition to the sums that are already appropriated for 1922.

But I continue, inasmuch as a question of fact is brought up about this matter:

Division of Mail and Files: Distributing clerk, $1,400; reading and routing clerk, $1,400; assistant file clerk, $1,100; assistant mail messenger, $900; in all, $4,800.

Is it possible to say that those men are going to stay there unless this appropriation is made? Why, of course they are not going to stay in the employ of the Government. talking about cutting down the expenses of clerk hire here in Washington, and boasting about it. I say you are not doing it. I say you are adding to what has already been done by Congress. The Senator from Utah says, "Why, we will decrease. We will decrease 1,000 clerks on the 1st of July"; and there are 580 of that number of 1,000 that are appropriated for in this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator should not make any such statement as that.

Mr. McKELLAR. But that is the truth and the fact about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Where does the Senator get the number? Mr. McKELLAR. Here it is: If these appropriations are not made, according to the statement made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Warren] a few minutes ago, 580 of these clerks, carrying a salary list of over $300,000, must necessarily be separated from the service. If you pass this bill, as you will do, those 580 clerks will stay on the rolls at the salaries fixed in this bill. That is the plain fact about it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator figures how many for the War

Risk Bureau?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not got to the War Risk Bureau yet. I say there are 138 here, and I hope the Senator will allow me to prove beyond the shadow of a doubt on the record, even if I can not prove it to the Senator, that I am absolutely right when I say that there are 138 additional clerks paid out of this appropriation that is called an emergency appropriation. We are told that it is an emergency! Why, I suspect it is. It is an emergency in this way: There are a number of those who are in the departments that your party want to keep there, and you have provided in this bill so that they may be kept there.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall not interrupt the Senator again. I know that he wants to make a political speech to use at home, and I have no objection at all to it, but I simply said what I did say for the RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not think this is a political speech. This is a speech on economy. I think there are a lot of Republicans who do not approve of this kind of economy-talking about cutting off a lot of clerks and putting them all back on an emergency bill. Think of it! "This is an emergency matter. We must do it. We must pay these men. Congress has cut them down a thousand," according to the Senator from Utah. "Congress has already cut down the number out of lump-sum appropriations by reducing lump-sum appropriations to the number of a thousand. We have got to save 580 of them. There are 580 of them that need looking after. We have got to save them, and we put it in here as an emergency matter."

I continue to read:

Division of bookkeeping and warrants: For the force to be transferred to this division on account of the transfer of duties from the division of public moneys, at annual rates of compensation during the fiscal year 1922, as follows: Assistant chief of division, $2,500; clerks—2 at $2,000 each, 3 at $1,800 each, 3 at $1,600 each, 2 at $1,400 each, 2 at $1,200 each; 2 messengers at $840 each; assistant messenger, $720; in all, $24,300.

Now I come to the office of the Comptroller of the Currency. That has been explained. I have nothing to say about it, except that there are provided for in this bill 38 additional clerks in that office, for which there are appropriated two sums, $37,880 and $14,800.

In the Bureau of War Risk Insurance they are paid out of a lump sum, it seems. They are not paid from a statutory roll. There is a lump sum already provided for these employees. These boys in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance seem to have ample funds there to pay.

Indeed, they seem to have more than is necessary, because while they do not put on new clerks in the War Risk Bureau, they have raised the salaries several hundred thousand dollars. I have not the figures exactly, but I will get them and put them in the RECORD, or anyone can make the calculation by looking at page 86 of the bill.

Now, Mr. President, I turn to the Department of the Interior, General Land Office, and find a provision for additional employees during the fiscal year ending 1922 at annual rates of compensation as follows: Law examiners, 4 at $2,000; 8 at $1,800; 20 at $1,600; 8 clerks at $1,400; in all, $65,600.

In the Bureau of Fisheries there is provision for 1 at $2,500,

1 at $1,400, 1 at $1,200, 1 at $840, 1 at $780; in all, $5,000. Steamer Phalarope: Master, $1,500; engineer, $1,200; fireman, $780; two seamen at $810 each; cook, $870; in all, fiscal year 1922, $5,970.

Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce: Two assistant directors and an expert on commercial laws in foreign countries at $4,000 each; in all, $12,000.

The total of all these, exclusive of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, in which the salaries are only raised, is 140, and with those where the salaries are raised they provide for clerks numbering, directly or indirectly, 580, with an appropriation far in excess of $300,000.

Mr. President, this may be economy, but I think it indicates that platform pledges and campaign pledges do not always tally with what is done afterwards. At all events, these are emergency employees. Just think of it, that here in Washington we have to stop in the middle of a special session, called, by the way, to consider tariff legislation and financial legislation, none of which seems to have gotten anywhere up to date, in a session called for those two special purposes, instead of doing that we are considering emergency legislation to get enough clerks to perform the requisite clerical services in peace times. I respectfully submit that is not economy.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the clerk transfer the amendment adopted awhile ago, on page 27, to page 89.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. Insert on page 89, after line 7, the Unexpended balances.

Mr. LENROOT. Is that the amendment referred to by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WARREN. The one he wanted to look over. Mr. LENROOT. Before that is adopted, I would like to ask why that comes in this bill, why it is not properly a matter to be dealt with by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. WARREN. It does not refer to anything that is ever considered by the Committee on Military Affairs. It is an extension from one year to the next of appropriations already made.

Mr. LENROOT. The Military Affairs Committee have considered it, and have acted on it in one respect.

Mr. WARREN. In what respect?

Mr. LENROOT. In limiting the amounts of unexpended balances in one item of appropriation, one of the largest unexpended balances, and has limited the amount which can be used.

Mr. WARREN. This is for some claims which are being settled at this time. It does not provide for anything else.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but I do not believe we ought, without specific information, make all unexpended balances available from year to year without knowing anything about it. There is nothing in the hearings upon this subject. I just examined them. In the Military Affairs Committee we went into it somewhat and we found the estimated obligations unpaid in one appropriation, and we have provided a limitation of the amount that can be used for that purpose; but, as I understood the amendment, this provides unlimited sums which can be used for personal services.

Mr. WARREN. Only $250,000.
Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, it seems to me this properly belongs in the Army appropriation bill. It is a matter which should be dealt with in that bill, and not in this one, and inasmuch as the Army bill will be considered immediately following this one, I think the Senator will not insist upon this amendment being considered now. Mr. WARREN. The Senator k The Senator knows very well that I am a member of the Military Affairs Committee, as he is, and I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and have been a member of both committees for a very long time. Deficiencies always have gone to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LENROOT. This is a surplus.

Mr. WARREN. No.
Mr. LENROOT. It is a surplus and would go back into the Treasury except for this legislation.

Mr. WARREN. It has been heretofore appropriated to pay for certain claims. The claims were presented to the Government in a way that made it impossible to settle them without very great investigation. For instance, there were claims for patents and things of that kind. Their number is now down to something over a hundred. There are tremendous claims, but they are being handled by the proper branch of the Government, and if we do not expend this it will simply mean that we shall have to treat those individually as they come up in the list of claims, or we shall have to let them go to the courts, and the judgments will be far larger than we will pay now.

Mr. LENROOT. That is hardly correct, because in the Army bill we do make express provision for either seven and a half or ten million dollars, to remain available for the very purpose for which this amendment seeks to make this available.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator must remember that this is made according to law.

Mr. LENROOT. The point is, Mr. President, if in the Army appropriation bill we have taken care of this matter the Senator will not insist that we should carry over all unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made to cover a case that has already been covered in another bill.

The Senator ought to know that I have read Mr. WARREN. the other bill and know its terms, and I say to him that I think they do not clash with each other. I have no reason for asking to have the jurisdiction of that committee infringed upon any more than I would to ask that the jurisdiction of this committee be infringed upon. But in looking the matter over with me, I am sure that the Senator would decide that the jurisdiction lies with the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, perhaps that is so, but I can not, at this time at least, concur with that statement, because the Committee on Military Affairs has dealt with this very subject in the bill that is now upon the calendar.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the Senator thinks it has, but I think the opposite. Let the matter go over for the present, if the Senator desires.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to have it go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over temporarily.

The next amendment was, on page 75, after line 8, to insert:

EMERGENCIES.

SEC. 4. For emergency appropriations and purposes as follows: CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For travel, printing, stationery, contingent expenses, additional employees, and other necessary expenses of examinations, fiscal year 1922, $100,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum, except one at $3,000.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, on line 14, page 78, I ask to have the amount changed from $15,000 to $20,000, to correspond with the estimate. I may say that the $15,000 was recommended by the subcommittee, but after investigation we decided that the amount should be raised to $20,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The Reading Clerk. On page 78, line 14, strike out "$15,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$20,000," so as to read:

For the purchase of additional land adjoining the Adams School, $20,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Then let the total be corrected in line 18. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 80, after line 5, to insert:

INTERDEPARTMENTAL SOCIAL HYGIENE BOARD.

INTERDEPARTMENTAL SOCIAL HYGIENE BOARD.

The duties and powers conferred upon the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board by Chapter XV of the Army appropriation act approved July 9, 1918, with respect to the expenditure of the appropriations made therein, are extended and made applicable to the appropriations for similar purposes made in this act.

For expenses of the board, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, books of reference and periodicals, printing and binding, traveling, and other necessary expenses, fiscal year 1922, $25,000.

For assisting the States in protecting the military and naval forces of the United States against venereal diseases, fiscal year 1922, $200,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended in assisting reformatories, detention homes, hospitals, or other similar institutions in the maintenance of venereally infected persons.

For allotment to the various States for the prevention, treatment, and control of venereal diseases, fiscal year 1922, $200,000: Provided, That the sum of $5,000 shall be first allotted from this appropriation to each State that satisfies the conditions and regulations governing this appropriation and the remainder of this appropriation shall then be allotted to each State in the proportion which its population bears to the population of the continental United States, exclusive of Alaska and the Canal Zone, in conformity with the conditions and regulations governing such allotments.

In all, Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board, $425,000.

Mr. WARREN. Let this amendment go over.

Mr. WARREN. Let this amendment go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over temporarily.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, reverting a moment to the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar], I have no comment to make upon his criticism further than that in large degree it is technical rather than real, and that is true especially with reference to the office of the Comptroller of the Currency

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says it is technical rather than real.

Mr. GLASS. Not altogether, I will say.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly it is real that the bill appropriates a little more than $300,000 for clerk hire for next year over what has already been appropriated. Is not that correct?

Mr. GLASS. Undoubtedly or the bill would not be here.

We said that when we brought it here.

Mr. McKELLAR. My statement was that the committee had reported a bill and the Senate was about to pass it, carrying a little over $300,000 for clerk hire that was not carried in the ordinary appropriation bills, and that they were adding to the clerical force here in the city of Washington.

Mr. GLASS. Undoubtedly we are making appropriations here that were not contained in the regular appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, otherwise we would

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield again, my understanding of a deficiency bill is that it is to make provision—
Mr. GLASS. The Senator's understanding of a deficiency bill is my understanding of a deficiency bill, but these are not

Mr. McKELLAR. Well!

Mr. GLASS. Of course, they are not. The committee thinks they are emergency appropriations.

Referring again to the comptroller's office, at the risk of repeating myself I desire to say that the force there is not for practical purposes increased. It has been the policy hitherto to detail clerks from other bureaus to the office of the Comptroller of the Currency. The departments will be so greatly reduced at the end of this fiscal year that that will not be feas ible, and it never ought to have been done at any time. The Comptroller of the Currency for the past eight years ought to have been treated fairly if not liberally in these matters. If we are to continue the business of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, we have got to appropriate for the clerks permanently who hitherto have been utilized in that way.

When Sir Hubert speaks, whether it be in criticism or in commendation or in citation of a fact, that usually is the end of it; but when on yesterday the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] insisted that there used to be more than 19,000 employees of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, I hesitatingly and mildly undertook to question the accuracy of his statement and said I thought not, but the Senator persisted and was so certain as that he was able to give me the exact number as 19,483. I appealed to him to drop at least three of the number, but he would not do that.

By reference to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1920 I find that the maximum number of persons employed at any one time during the fiscal year was 15,480, and I had that number in mind when I made the assertion, or rather, when I ventured to express the belief that the number of employees in the War Risk Insurance Bureau had never exceeded 15,000. As a matter of fact, the greatest number of employees of the War Risk Bureau at any time since the establishment of the bureau was 17,336, so that the Senator from Utah, on whose capabilities as a statistician we all so often rely, was mistaken in the number by more than 2,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I said to the Senator that as I remembered it was 19.483. I sent down to the bureau to find out and received a detailed statement that I now have in my office. The Senator has said, of course, that the highest number was 17,300.

Mr. GLASS. The Secretary of the Treasury said that in his official report.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator yesterday stated it was less than 15,000.

Mr. GLASS. I said about 15,000. Mr. SMOOT. Less than 15,000.

Mr. GLASS. But I was not so confident that I could name the number to a fractional point as the Senator was. The Senator just made a mistake of 2,100, that is all.

Mr. SMOOT. I think I can furnish the information from the bureau itself, and I have written the bureau to get it.

Mr. GLASS. There is the official information. The matter is of no consequence, but being a new Member of this body I did not wish to get the reputation at the very outset of ques-tioning the assertions made by the veteran Members of the body without some basis for it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] hardly thought there had been any reduction to speak of in any department.

Mr. GLASS. The number had been reduced from 17,336 before I left the Treasury to a little in excess of 7,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wish to make this suggestion, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt, that I hope the figures of my good friend the Senator from Utah which he gave this afternoon in reference to the pending bill will be found to be more accurate than his figures on yesterday afternoon as to the number of employees in the War Risk Insurance Bureau. We all know how busy and active the Senator from Utah always is, and it is no wonder that he gets figures mixed up, having so many matters to come before him in his official capacity. However, he gets very much mixed up in his figures at times and is very much mixed in his figures with reference to the pending

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize, of course, that some Senators do not give any time at all to the matter of figures, and yet they can find fault with those who do. However, they were not my figures that I gave this afternoon. They were the figures of the Civil Service Commission, and if the Senator desires to see the reports I shall hand them to him.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should be very glad to look them over.

Mr. SMOOT. I hand them to the Senator now. Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I apologize for precipitating the discussion of an inconsequential matter.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, June 3, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 2, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our blessed heavenly Father, Thou art the bread of life and all the material wonders that it suggests. After these forms have yielded us their bounties and their beauties help us to realize that behind them all is something full of infinite glory and mercy. Beyond the sacred page of Nature help us to see God with a compelling reverence and gratitude, for-

"Back of the loaf is the wholesome flour, And back of the flour is the mill,

And back of the mill are the wheat and the shower, The sun and the Father's will.'

Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ALIEN LAND LAWS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, our colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. Curry], has prepared a manuscript of the alien land laws of the various States of the United States. I have looked over the manuscript, and if I had prepared it myself I would think it was a very fine piece of work. I believe it ought to be printed as a House document. I think it is invaluable for reference work, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a House document within the $500 limit. I have received the estimate, and we can get a little below a thousand for $500. A thousand would cost $580.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the document referred to be printed as a House document. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TAXATION.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ASWELL. On what subject? Mr. KELLER. On revenue bills that I have introduced to-day.

Mr. ASWELL. I do not object. Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced four bills. The first bill repeals all existing transportation and sales taxes except those on tobacco, distilled spirits, oleomargarine, habit-forming drugs, and products of child labor. The bill also repeals the excess-profits tax and the 10 per cent tax on the incomes of corporations.

The second bill amends the income tax law so as to distinguish between "earned" and "unearned" income. The tax on "unearned" income, together with the supertaxes, is retained, but the tax on "earned" incomes is cut in two.
"Earned" income is defined as income derived from personal services or from business personally conducted.

"Unearned" income is defined as income derived from rents of land or other property; interest on mortgages, notes, or bonds; dividends on shares of stock whether in the form of money or stock dividends; and from any source other than the labor, skill, or business or industry personally conducted of the person receiving the income.

The third bill amends the inheritance tax. Beginning with estates of $20,000 to $35,000 there is a tax of 1 per cent; $35,000 to $50,000, 2 per cent; $50,000 to $150,000, 4 per cent; $150,000 to $250,000, 6 per cent. The taxes then graduate on an increased scale until the point of $100,000,000 is reached, after which the tax is 90 per cent.

The fourth bill provides for a tax of 1 per cent on land values in excess of $10,000 after exempting buildings and improvements, and in the case of farms, cost of clearing, draining, and maintenance of fertility. This bill aims to tax monopoly holders of natural resources, valuable "sites" in cities, and the holding of land out of use. The exemptions are so applied to farms as to exempt from taxation, according to my estimate, approximately 98 per cent of all actual farmers.

The four bills are sponsored by the Committee on Manufacturers and Merchants, a national association of business men, of which Otto Cullman, 1346 Altgeld Street, Chicago, is chairman; and by the Farmers' Federal Tax League, of which Lieut. Gov. George F. Cummings, of Madison, Wis., is president.

Accompanying the bills I present a budget showing that the three bills, together with customs and other miscellaneous revenue, will raise funds sufficient to meet the Government budget and in addition provide a sinking fund which would pay off the Government debt in 30 years. In a statement to the press I said:

My revenue program will relieve producing business of $1,730,000,000 annually and the people of from three to five times this amount in inflated living costs.

I am in favor of the removal of all taxes on business and industry, including the excess-profits tax and the corporation income tax, but only on condition that my revenue program is accepted in its entirety. If my new revenue bills are rejected, I will withdraw my amendments repealing the corporation taxes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KELLER, I will.

Mr. GARNER. Has this inspiration come to the gentleman since the Republican conference last night?

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have been working on this proposition for two months with some of the ablest experts in the United States preparing a statement of this kind. have taken the estimates of some of the experts in the House, especially the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in regard to the budget and the tentative budget estimate and of men who have made a study of the revenue bills in the past. I have a very complete prepared statement which I shall submit in the extension of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

JOHN P. BRACKEN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a memorial from John P. Bracken, praying admission as a Member of the House of Representatives as a Congressman at large from the State of Pennsylvania, which was referred to the Committee on Elections No. 2.

FLORENCE E. WEAKLEY.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 87.

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Florence E. Weakley, sister of Alvin Weakley, late an employee of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months of his compensation as such employee, and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray the expenses of the funeral of said Alvin Weakley.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual resolution for the dependents of a deceased employee, and all the precautions usually taken have been taken.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolu-

J. C. MEHRKENS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up House resolution 88 from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 88.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to J. C. Mehrkens, clerk to the late Hon. William H. Frankhauser, a Representative in Congress from Michigan at the time of his death, May 9, 1921, the sum of $186.66, being an amount equal to one month's salary of a clerk of a Representative in Congress.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, that is the usual resolution. Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes. Mr. GARNER. I believe this is to pay the clerk of a Member who never had been in attendance on the House of Representatives. Did he have a clerk designated on the roll?

Mr. IRELAND. We are so informed. The clerk was the same one who served his predecessor, and had been in attendance, even though the late Member he served had not.

Mr. GARNER. That is not the question. I ask whether or not the clerk's name was on the roll as required by law?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly; else we would not have considered the resolution.

Mr. GARNER. Is this a unanimous report of the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. IRELAND. It is; as I now recall the action.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolu-

ASSISTANT CLERK, COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read. The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 55.

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills be authorized to appoint an assistant clerk to the Committee on Enrolled Bills, who shall receive compensation at the rate of $6 per diem during the sessions of the Sixty-seventh Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, payment to commence from the date such clerk entered upon the performance of his duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairman of said committee.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is this the resolution that comes up each Congress

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.
Mr. GARNER. Why do we not make this permanent law?
Mr. IRELAND. I think we should. I do not know why it has not been attended to before. It is something that we have to do each Congress, and this clerk has been at work ever since the beginning of the session. It is due to the negligence of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts that this has not been presented before.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman contemplate looking after the matter and seeing that it does become permanent law?

Mr. IRELAND. I suggested it before, and that is about all I can do.

Mr. GARNER. Whose fault is it that it does not become permanent law? Mr. IRELAND. I do not know that anyone is particularly at fault; but it might be taken up by the Committee on Appropriations and a permanent assistant clerk granted the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolu-

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON MILEAGE.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read. The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 91.

Resolved, That the Committee on Mileage be, and is hereby, authorized to hire a clerk for the said committee for a period of two months during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-seventh Congress, compensation of the said clerk to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives at the rate of $125 per month.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 85.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department be, and is hereby, allowed a clerk at a salary at the rate of $1,500 per annum for the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is a relic of the last Congress, inherited from the Special Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. The committee needs this clerk. There is an accumulation of correspondence on hand and the committee convinced the Committee on Accounts that they are entitled to this consideration.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Has this committee met during this Congress?

Mr. IRELAND. I am not sure about that.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is this the same committee that met so frequently in the last Congress?

Mr. IRELAND. No. The personnel of the committee is different.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is this committee provided with an attorney or counsel?

Mr. IRELAND. I hardly think so. The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolu-

HOUSE RESTAURANT.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read. The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 99.

Resolved. That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House such sums as may be necessary to make such alterations and improvements of the rooms occupied by the restaurant of the House of Representatives, and to reequip the restaurant with sanitary fixtures and utensils as may, in the judgment of the Committee on Accounts, be deemed advisable and necessary; and until otherwise ordered by the House the management of the House Restaurant and all matters connected therewith shall be under the direction of the Committee on

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment before the vote is taken on this resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is my impression that the control of this restaurant has heretofore been with another committee of the House. Is that correct; and if so, has it been by law or by resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. I think it has always been under the control of the Speaker. That is my understanding,

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. IRELAND. Yes. I think I should state that I believe on very good authority that the Speaker desires to be relieved of this control.

Mr. KING. I am certainly in hearty sympathy with this resolution. I did not notice anything in the resolution about whether or not there would be any improvement in the food furnished by the restaurant.

Mr. IRELAND. I hope there will be.

Mr. KING. The gentleman could not give us any line on the change to be made in the character of food, in regard, say, to half and half and crackers?

Mr. BARKLEY. I suppose any sort of change would be an advantage, would it not?

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I think I should take a moment, not to attempt to answer the facetious remarks of the gentlemen, but to assure the House that the plans under way we are hopeful will meet with the approval of the House when consummated. It is impossible to attend to these matters or for Members to expect any permanent improvement prior to the vacation that the House may take late in the summer. The restaurant, and the kitchens especially, are in such ill repair that it would entirely disorganize things to even attempt the work while the House is in session. The service in the restaurant, poor as it is at present, would have to be discontinued entirely, and I imagine Members would prefer what they are getting to nothing. Members should not hope for any improvement until after the vacation.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am not asking this question facetiously, but for information. Is it not a fact that under the Democratic administration and also under the Republican administration, and, in fact, practically ever since the House Office Building has been constructed, the running of this restaurant has been a matter of patronage? Does not the man who runs it get it as a matter of patronage? I do not mean now any more than under the Democratic administratiton.

Mr. IRELAND. I do not believe so.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The reason I asked that is this: I have been informed that it is a matter of patronage and that some Republican is now running it; that he receives it as a matter of patronage, the same as some Democrat did when the Democrats were in control. I have been further informed that he is furnished his light, his space, his dishes, his linen, his heat all free, and at the same time, as the gentleman knows, we are paying as much as or more here than we would in any firstclass restaurant down town.

Mr. IRELAND. That is absolutely correct, save as to the matter of patronage. I think the gentleman is misinformed in respect to that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.
Mr. CHINDBLOM. Under this resolution, as I understand it, the control of the restaurant will immediately go to the Committee on Accounts. Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I hope the gentleman will not banish all hope of any improvement of any sort until after the vacation.

Mr. IRELAND. If the gentleman were familiar with the conditions I do not believe he would expect any improvement with the present arrangement.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman says that he does not be-lieve that it is under patronage. Is it not a fact that whoever has it is furnished the things that I have enumerated absolutely free?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; that has always been the custom.
Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman knows that we pay as much for what we get here as we would at a first-class restaurant down town.

Mr. IRELAND. There is no excuse for the prices charged, in consideration of the service.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I wish to say that the restaurant has not been under patronage, and nobody connected with it is under patronage. I speak as a member of the patronage committee. It has never had anything to do with the restaurant.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. IRELAND. Yes.
Mr. ASWELL. In the deficiency appropriation bill which we passed the other day there was carried an item for this, and now this resolution proposes to take it out of the contingent fund. Is this the same item that the deficiency bill carried the other day

Mr. IRELAND. Yes. Mr. ASWELL. Can the gentleman inform the House whether it is contemplated to put the waiters on the pay roll under this new plan?

Mr. IRELAND. Well, that is not a matter that has as yet been considered.

Mr. ASWELL. But does the gentleman think that it is likely to be?

Mr. IRELAND. I suppose the gentleman sought to inquire whether we shall pursue the same policy now employed by the Senate?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. IRELAND. That has not been decided. Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman when he first arose said he was not going to indulge in any facetiousness. If he was not, I would like to ask the gentleman what he is doing when he referred to a possible recess during the summer? It occurred to me it could not be anything but facetiousness.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will this act of confiscation cast any reflection upon the Speaker?

Mr. IRELAND. Save a commendable one, I think not.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the reso-

PACKERS BILL.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the so-called packers' bill, on which a third reading had been ordered. Does the gentleman from Texas still desire a reading of the engrossed bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not. The bill was read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recom-

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Jones of Texas moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: On page 22, line 1, strike out all of section 311.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to recommit the bill with instructions.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. The SPEAKER. It is clear there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question was taken; and there were—yeas 71, nays 258, answered "present" 7, not voting 95, as follows:

VETERANS' BUREAU.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, by virtue of permission granted by the House to the effect that the bill H. R. 6611 should be considered immediately after the conclusion of the consideration of the packers bill, so called, I desire to call that

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the Union Calendar, is it not?
Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6611.

Perhaps it would be well to make arrangements as to time and a division of it. I would suggest that the time for debate be divided equally between the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], representing his side of the House, and myself, representing this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there any agreement as to the amount of Mr. WINSLOW. The committee feels that all of to-day is likely to be consumed in general debate on this bill. Unless it should appear that there is not sufficient interest to take all the time which the day might afford, I think it would be fair to have in mind that all of this day will be devoted to the consideration of the bill in general debate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make that as a request? Mr. WINSLOW. No. Mr. BARKLEY. If arrangement as to division of the time is agreed upon, it ought to be done in the House, inasmuch as that arrangement can not be made in the Committee of the

Mr. WINSLOW. I would like to have permission to have the time equally divided, as already indicated.

The SPEAKER. When the request was first made it was that half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Winslow]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the gentleman that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6611) to establish in the Treasury Department a veterans' bureau and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau, and further to amend and modify the war risk insurance act, with Mr. Anderson in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill

H. R. 6611, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6611) to establish in the Treasury Department a veterans' bureau and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau, and further to amend and modify the war risk insurance act.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill probably interests more people of the country than any other subject for legislation that we have before us. Since the establishment of the War Risk Insurance Bureau and the subsequent establishment of the Public Health Service for the benefit of soldiers, and the Federal Board for Vocational Education, it has been clearly apparent to everybody who has had to do with soldier life in any of its phases that there has been no proper, well-organized department for handling the interests of the soldiers. Out of that situation there came some months ago a clear recognition of the fact that something should be done which would make the care of soldier matters more complete and a system established which would approach efficiency if one could be devised.

This bill represents the best thought which the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has been able to obtain, either as a result of its own inquiries and investigations or in consequence of testimony submitted by various people and organizations most interested. It will be no misstatement to assert that the four great institutions of the country which are most particularly concerned in the management of soldier matters have agreed, as near as any set of organizations or people ever can agree, on this bill as probably being the most complete and serviceable legislation that can be passed. I hardly think that any member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce would assume to claim that every provision of the bill is complete and perfect. It would be exceedingly difficult to reconcile the expediency and the views of three of four huge departments, such as are interested in this matter, so thoroughly as not to have a hint or a doubt standing out somewhere.

I might say the fundamental interest in this matter is represented by the legislative committee of the World War soldiers of this country. That committee contributed through the head of the legion, its counsel, and others the best opinions they had. While not being technical to the very last degree, I feel warranted in saying that this bill bears the stamp of very general approval on the part of the legislative committee of the legion. It also has been approved, as finally as a bill could be, by those representing the expert applied interests of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the Public Health Service, and the Federal Board for Vocational Education. So we come before you with four great elements which ought to be regarded as having the most interest in this matter agreeing on this bill, namely, the legion, through its legislative committee, the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the Public Health Service, and the Federal Board for Vocational Education.

I do not mean to take any time on the sentimental features of the soldier interests covered by this bill. We all have our sympathetic feelings toward them and want to do everything we can for them, but I do not feel that this bill offers a very fitting opportunity for running off into the realms of sentiment and tears.

It is a straight up-and-down business proposition, and it should be so regarded, and I hope it will be regarded in debate as a business consideration.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. WINSLOW. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. With reference to section 1 of the bill, I notice at the top of the page that the Director of War Risk Insurance is definitely abolished. Further down I note that the functions and duties and powers of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance are taken over, and also the functions, duties, and powers conferred upon the Board of Vocational Education are transferred to the director. Does the gentleman interpret the act to mean that the Board of Vocational Education will cease to exist as far as soldier activities are concerned upon the passage of this law?

Mr. WINSLOW. If the gentleman from Indiana will kindly indulge me, I shall not undertake to escape his question, but to make a statement that the work of describing the purposes of this bill and of discussing primarily and in the first instance the various features of it has been accorded to its author, Mr. Sweet, to whom I shall yield immediately, and it will be his pleasure and opportunity to answer every question which may be presented to him.

With that brief statement, Mr. Chairman, I yield an hour to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Sweet], the author of the bal and the chairman of the subcommittee which gave it particular consideration. [Applause.]
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Sweet] is recognized for an hour.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I will say that in the first instance I wish to go over the legislation that has been passed for the benefit of the disabled ex-service men of this country, and then follow with a brief analysis of each section of the bill, and during that time I desire not to be interrupted.

Mr. Chairman, addressing the wounded soldiers at Walter Reed Hospital, President Harding expressed the wish that "by the wave of some magic wand the maimed might be restored, but that since this was impossible the next best thing was for the Republic to prove its gratitude to the soldiers by restoring them to a condition in which they may live as happily as possible." And he added, "I know this thought is in the heart of the Congress, and I can assure you that it is in the heart of the Executive, and, more, I know it is in the heart of the people of this country.

The present Executive of the Nation has stated the matter clearly and forcefully. The attitude of Congress without regard to party or politics has been to deal fairly and sympathetically in the enactment of legislation for the benefit of the disabled ex-service men of the country.

The demobilization of a great army of over 4,000,000 men is as great a question as the mobilization and organization of that

The restoration of our country following a mighty war, the return of men to the avocations of peace, the binding up of the Nation's wounds, the proper care of the orphans and widows of those who bore the brunt of battle, the care and treatment of those who are maimed and who are suffering from diseases and ailments that were contracted while in the service, the proper hospitalization of the Nation's wards, the rehabilitation of men and fitting them as far as it is possible to take part again in the ordinary affairs of life, the restoration of the impaired intellects of men and bringing them back to themselves and to their relatives and friends, the banishment of the phantoms of the mind, the inculcation of love of country and a genuine desire for the established order of things-these are some of the things to be accomplished.

It is important that every citizen should understand clearly his relations to his Government, notwithstanding the horrors of war and the uncertainties and difficulties to be encountered during the years following the war. Let those who took part in the great struggle know that we as a free and liberty-loving people are proud of the services that they rendered and that it is our desire not only to honor them but to treat them, in so far as it may be possible, with exact justice.

We want them to realize that this is the best Government on earth. We want them through all the years to come to stand for law and order and great ideals of the Republic. In short, so that they will be at all times in heart and mind for the Republic and not against it.

In view of the many things that have been said, either truthfully or untruthfully, relative to what the Nation has been doing for the benefit of ex-service men, it might be well to review briefly the legislation that has been enacted by Congress during the war and since the war in the interests of those who participated in that great conflict.

War was declared on April 6, 1917. Within the short space of four months thereafter the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House was considering legislation for the immediate benefit of the dependents of those who were to be-come a part of the Military Establishment of the Government and engage in the World War; for the benefit of the dependents of those who would in all probability make the supreme sacrifice; for the benefit of those who would be maimed, their bodies torn by shot and shell or ravaged by disease; for the benefit of those whose nerves would be shattered or intellects dethroned as a result of the hardships they must endure, the dangers they must pass through, the ordeals they must encounter, and the horrors they must experience in taking part in the activities of a relentless warfare. On October 6, 1917, just six months after the war began, Congress passed what should be known as the Rayburn bill. This legislation was largely due to the activities of Mr. Rayburn as a Member of Congress. The bill was divided into four parts: Article I, administration; Article II, allotment and allowance; Article III, compensation; Article IV, war-risk insurance.

Up to March 31, 1921, the operating expenses or administra-tion expenses of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance had amounted to about $42,000,000.

During the war, under the provisions of the act, the soldier was permitted to allot a certain portion of his pay, and to the amount allotted the Government added an allowance. On March 31, 1921, the total disbursements for allotments and allowances amounted to about $572,262,333.59, of which amount the allotments were $296,251,306.59, and the Government allowances on the same date amounted to $276,011,027.

On March 31, 1921, 599,239 claims for compensation had been filed. Of this number 380,484 were allowed and 197,144 disallowed.

On March 31, 1921, the total disbursements for compensation amounted to $202,995,308.29.

On March 31, 1921, there were approximately 405,674 war risk term insurance policies, amounting to $3,000,114,937, in force. This includes 322,115 policies carried for men out of the service and approximately 83,559 policies carried by men still in the

On March 31, 1921, the actual disbursements in the payment of war risk term insurance awards amounted to $198,405,907.95. The total amount of liability, however, involved in war risk insurance claims, upon which payments are now being made, amounts to $1,190,996,727.63. The payment of this amount is extended over a period of nearly 20 years.

On March 31, 1921, the United States Government life insurance policies issued as a result of the conversion of yearly renewable term insurance to persons insured, numbered 277,890, and amounted to $916,112,000. The Treasury Department has announced a dividend of not less than $1 per thousand of United States Government life insurance.

The total number of United States Government life insurance claims received to March 31, 1921, was 993. Of this number, 451 have been allowed and 150 disallowed. On March 31, 1921, monthly payments were being made on 273 claims. On March 31, 1921, the total amount disbursed in payment of awards was $1,211,425,78.

That at the present time the Government owes for insurance claims pending $1,190,996,727.63, the payment of which extends over a period of nearly 20 years.

The Government of the United States distributed to 2,135,465 dependents of soldiers $276,011,027 in practically two years. It distributed this sum to the dependents of those who were fighting the Nation's battles.

Through allotments of soldiers the Government has also disbursed $296,251,306.59 to approximately 2,135,465 dependents of soldiers.

That on December 24, 1919, Congress passed what was known as the Sweet bill, which practically trebled the amount of compensation to be paid the disabled ex-service men of the country. Under the retroactive features of the bill, which related to compensation, there was disbursed by the War Risk Insurance Bureau, within a period of 100 days after the law went into effect. about $31,000,000. The insurance features were also liberalized and made more workable,

This bill also made provision for furnishing to the disabled ex-service men, in addition to the compensation provided for them, such reasonable governmental, medical, surgical, and hospital services, supplies, artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances as the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau might determine to be useful and reasonably necessary. Under this provision the United States Government, in addition to compensation, assumed the obligation of furnishing men who had been disabled hospital care and treatment in order that they might be put back into ordinary life in the best condition possible. In order to carry out the provisions of the law relative to furnishing hospital treatment and care to the disabled soldiers, $46,000,000 was appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and $33,000,000 has been appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922.

On March 4, 1921, in furtherance of the hospitalization plan and for the purpose of giving the disabled soldiers proper care and treatment, Congress passed what was known as the Langley bill, appropriating $18.600,000, $12,500,000 for the construction of hospitals, and $6,100,000 to be used in remodeling or extending existing plants.

In the sundry civil bill which passed Congress on June 5, 1920, the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers were made accessible to the wounded and disabled veterans of the World War, and appropriations were made by Congress for the purpose of making the act effective. About 4,000 of the veterans of the World War at present are being taken care of at these homes.

On June 27, 1918, Congress passed what was known as the Fess bill, to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes. Under the terms of this act the disabled ex-service men of the World War receive vocational training. During the time that they are taking vocational training the Fess bill provided that each person shall receive $80 per month.

On July 11, 1919, Congress passed what was known as the Darrow bill, which provided that every person pursuing a course of vocational training should receive $80 per month for a single man, without dependents, or for a man with dependents $100 per month, plus the several sums prescribed as family allowances under section 204 of article 2 of the war risk insurance act. In other words, every person taking vocational training would receive at least $80 per month, and if he had dependents, he might receive as much as $132.50 per month, provided he had a wife and two children, with $5 per month for each additional child. In other words, while the soldier is getting vocational training free he is paid $80 per month and his family is being liberally assisted by the Government.

On March 1, 1921, the vocational board had spent $89,521,414.24 since the passage of the rehabilitation act on June 17, 1918. Of this amount $68,000,000 has been spent in direct allowances for maintenance of the men themselves. The overhead for the entire time since the organization of the rehabilitation work, including rent, office equipment, and supplies, salaries, printing, travel, and subsistence of employees, telephone, and telegraph, and so forth, was approximately 14 per cent, or $12,532,997.99.

On March 3, 1921, Congress passed what was known as the Wason bill for the purpose of improving the facilities and service of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and further amending and modifying the war risk insurance act. This bill was not signed by President Wilson. The Wason bill carried an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the purpose of establishing regional offices and suboffices throughout the United States.

The Government of the United States, for allowance, allotment, compensation, hospitalization, vocational training, on March 31, 1921, had appropriated $1,454,877,527.49. On March 31, 1921, it had expended for the above purposes $1,099,514,252.23. In addition to that the Government also constructed what is known as the Arlington Building at a cost of $4,454,048.53, including cost of land, where the activities of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance have been carried on in the District of Columbia.

The following statements in regard to allotments, allowances, compensation, insurance, hospitalization, and vocational training may be of interest to the Members of the House, and for that reason they are set forth at length herein.

ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES.

No applications for military and naval family allowances have been received since March 4, 1921, this having been discontinued by an act of Congress. The payment of family allowance will be discontinued on and after July 31, 1921.

On March 31 there were 456 employees engaged in this work in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. Their present duties include the regular monthly payment upon 75,405 active accounts, together with the final adjustment of many accounts upon which payments are not being made at present. While the number of employees engaged in this work will be greatly decreased on and after July 31, there will still be many settlements to be adjusted after that date, which it is estimated will require the services of a portion of the present personnel. In order to take care of the marked increase of work in the compensation and insurance-claims division, such of the remainder as are necessary are being transferred as fast as possible, and any surplus will be released.

WAR RISK TERM INSURANCE.

There were approximately 405,674 war risk term insurance policies, amounting to $3,114,937,000, in force on March 31, 1921. This includes 322,115 policies carried by men out of service and approximately 83,559 policies carried by men still in the service.

The average number of reinstatements received during the past year has been in excess of 9,000 per month. A total of $362,471,569.03 has been received in premiums upon term insurance. Actual disbursements in the payment of war risk term insurance awards amounts to $198,405,907.95; the total amount of the liability, however, involved in war risk insurance claims upon which payments are now being made amounts to $1,190,996,727.63.

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT LIEE INSURANCE.

United States Government life insurance policies issued as a result of the conversion of war risk term insurance to permanent insurance numbered 277,890 and amounted to $916,112,000 on March 31. The average number of converted policies issued per month has been in excess of 14,000, although for the month of March records show 7,809; this number naturally varies from month to month. The largest number of policies issued in any one month during the past year was 21,278 in September, 1920

The Treasury Department has announced a dividend of not less than $1 per thousand on United States Government life insurance.

All United States Government life insurance premiums are credited to a fund or appropriation known as the United States Government life insurance fund, out of which all claims, loans, and cash surrenders are paid. This fund, which includes both premiums and the interest on investments, amounted to $26,409,544.22 on March 31, 1921.

PENDING COMPENSATION CLAIMS.

There were 93,613 claims pending on March 31, 1921, of which an analysis has been made showing the length of time pending and the reason for the delay for each claim. This analysis reveals the fact that of the number pending 25,229 were awaiting claimant's proof in the form of affidavits; 3,751 were awaiting official information from the War and Navy Departments to connect the disability with service; 9,466 were awaiting the report of physical examination; and 865 were pending because claimants were located in foreign countries. No claim is disallowed until it is reasonably certain that everything has been done to enable the claimant to present a valid claim.

(Important for above. The balance of the claims not explained are so recent that they are pending for several of the reasons.)

AWARDING OF COMPENSATION CLAIMS.

On March 31, 1921, there were 228 claims examiners. The question is often asked, "How many claims can an examiner award per day?" This can not be answered by stating a fixed number because no two claims are alike. The work of a claims examiner might well be compared to that of a judge, whose cases are all different, especially as regards amount of time required. Each day adds to the difficulty of adjudicating the new claims which the bureau receives, numbering approximately 900 per day, because of the difficulty in connecting the claimant's disability with his service record, which is required by law before an award can be made. Thus a claim must be kept pending until its validity can be established.

COMPENSATION CLAIMS.

To April 1, 1921, 599,239 claims for compensation had been is estimated. Of this number, 380,484 were allowed and 197,142 disallowed. Monthly payments were being made on 199,011 claims on March 31, of which number 46,196 were claims for death and 152,815 were claims for disability. During the past year the number of claims filed monthly has averaged more than 18,000. The largest number, 22,209, was filed during March, 1921. The total disbursements for compensation amounted to $202,995,308.29 on March 31, 1921. Disbursements for the month of March, 1921, were $9,778,623.59.

The number of examinations of claimants for compensation, including reexaminations, totaled 777,511 on March 31, 1921. During the past six months the number of cases referred monthly to the district supervisors of the United States Public Health Service for examination has averaged 45,000. The total number of admittance cards issued for hospital treatment to April 1 was 119,679. Of this number 60,525 were for the United States Public Health Service hospitals, and 59,154 for hospitals of the War and Navy Department, the soldiers' homes, and private contract hospitals. The number remaining in hospitals, both private and Government, on March 31, 1921, was 25,144.

HOSPITAL FUND ALLOTMENTS AND EXPENDITURES.

Out of the original appropriation of $46,000,000 for the hospitalization of war-risk insurance beneficiaries, $33,607,668 has been allotted to the Bureau of Public Health Service, soldiers' homes, and the hospitals of the Army and Navy Departments. Disbursements by the bureau out of this fund on that date amounted to $1,476,539, leaving a balance of $10,915,793 for future expenditures.

According to the disbursements of the past three quarters of this fiscal year out of the fund for hospital and medical cure, it is estimated that there will be a deficit of $8,710,272 on June 20, 1021

VOCATIONAL TRAINING.

The Federal Board for Vocational Education has a central office in Washington, 14 district offices, and 137 local offices throughout the country. The central office exercises general supervision over the work throughout the country, audits, approves, and pays all bills, defines policies, entertains and passes on appeals regarding eligibility and character of training.

The district office exercises general supervision over the district, gathers information which will establish eligibility of men for training, rates men as being eligible or ineligible for training, approves training arrangements, makes contracts with institutions for training, and has charge of the general follow-up of all men in training.

The local office, in charge of a local supervisor, is charged with the responsibility of entering men who are declared eligible into training and giving such men such personal service and help as is necessary and possible and of getting men who have been trained back into employment at the completion of their training.

The net registration of men whose eligibility for training is being investigated is increasing at the rate of 16,000 per month. The number pending final decision on April 1 was 26,000, less than twice the number of the increase per month. The chief causes why these are pending are, first, the board is unable on the basis of the evidence at hand to connect the present claimed disability with military service; and second, it is unable to get accurate and satisfactory medical information from certain parts of the country as quickly as is desirable. There is no delay in awarding training to men who are obviously disabled and whose disability can be traced to the service. A large number of men, however, who were discharged with no disability are now claiming disability, and it is difficult to always establish connection of the present claimed disability with the service.

The first 2,000 men who were rehabilitated went into 153 different kinds of employment at an average annual wage of $1,463.33. The average prewar wage of the same men was $1,072.71. In reading the above figures, however, it must be borne in mind that before the war these men were physically sound and the annual wage given was at the end of their prewar employment, while they are now entering employment physically disabled and the wage given is that which they are earning at the beginning of their post-war employment. These men also received varying amounts of compensation from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in addition to the $1,463.33 annual wage.

The board is using about 2,000 schools and 8,000 plants and factories in retraining men. It is the policy of the board to use regularly established educational institutions rather than establish and maintain another system of education in America.

Congress has allowed the board to use its discretion in fixing 62 salaries in excess of $2,500 per annum. The board has fixed the maximum amount allowed in 21 instances and is paying less than the maximum allowed in 41.

Reports from schools and colleges throughout the country show that approximately 90 per cent of the men in training are making good. The 10 per cent who are not making good are the ones usually heard from rather than the 90 per cent who are making good. Practically all of the 90 per cent believe in the Government and in what it is doing in the retraining of men who have vocational handicaps.

The Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks furnished a revolving fund to loan men money to tide them over until their first pay check came from the Government. The original fund was $200,000. The total amount loaned up to March 1, 1921, was $636,596.48. Up to that date there had been repaid $581,095.94, or about 91 per cent of the total amount loaned. It should be remembered that the Elks had no way to collect this money except by appealing to the honesty of the man and his ability to pay. It is a remarkable record.

Men going into training throughout the country receive their first pay check within 20 days from the time they enter training.

The heard is paying all man in training every 15 days.

The board is paying all men in training every 15 days.

As of March 1, 1921, approximately 15 per cent of the men in training in section 2 were in training in prevocational or tryout courses, not occupational therapy; 34 per cent were in trade and industrial courses; 24 per cent in business and commercial courses; 12 per cent in agriculture; and 14 per cent in professional courses.

The board is giving prevocational or vocational training in practically all hospitals where disabled men are being sent by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. The last report shows 9,000 men in training in 122 hospitals.

Up to March 1, 1921, the board had spent $89,521,414.24, since the passage of the rehabilitation act on June 17, 1918, two and a half years ago. Of this $68,000,000 has been spent in direct allowances for maintenance to the men themselves. The overhead for the entire time since the organization of the rehabilitation work, which includes rent, office equipment and supplies, salaries, printing, travel and subsistence of employees, telephone and telegraph, etc., was approximately 14 per cent. This overhead has decreased to less than 8 per cent in the month of March, 1921, during which month the total expenditures were $11,044,330.13, of which $8,250,000 went directly to the men themselves for maintenance.

It may be interesting to compare the Civil War with the World War, as to number of troops, number of deaths, and number of wounded.

In the Civil War there were 2,772,408 Union troops engaged.

In the World War there were 4,800,000 soldiers, sailors, and marines engaged.

According to a statistical summary made by Col. Leonard P. Ayres, chief of the statistical branch, General Staff, and published by him on August 1, 1919, the following statements are made relative to the World War:

American battle deaths Americans wounded overseas Americans died from disease
Total deaths in the World War	115, 500

The number of casualties in the Volunteer and Regular Armies of the United States during the war of 1861–1865, according to a statement prepared by The Adjutant General's office, was as follows:

Killed in battle
Died from other causes-accidents, murders, Confederate	199, 720
prisons, etc	40, 154

According to a statement made in the annual report of the Secretary of War for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the total number of wounded in the Civil War was 246,712; in the World War, 224,089.

Total deaths_

Approximately 3,350,000 men were demobilized, and the records of 3,154,676 have been examined. Ninety-three and seventenths per cent were discharged with none or less than 10 per cent disability; 5.3 per cent were reported to the War Risk Insurance Bureau with a disability of 10 per cent or more; 1 per cent were held either on account of disease requiring further treatment to obtain the maximum improvement, and for other purposes.

An examination of this statement will show that in 1866 the Government paid $15,450,549.88 as pensions to 126,722 persons. In 1876 the Government paid $27,936,000 as pensions to 232,137 persons. In 1886 the United States Government paid $64,091,000 as pensions to 365,783 persons. In 1896 the United States Government paid $138,220,000 as pensions to 970,678 persons. In 1906 the United States Government paid $139,000,000 to 985,971 persons. In 1916 the United States Government paid $159,-155,000 as pensions to 709,572 persons. In 1919 the United States Government paid $222,159,000 as pensions to 624,427 persons.

The largest number of pensioners in any one year since 1866 and up to the present time was in 1902, when the number reached 999,446.

The largest amount of money paid pensioners in any one year since 1866 and up to the present time was during the year 1919, when it amounted to over $222,000,000.

In 1920 the amount paid by the United States Government as pensions was $213,295,000 to 592,190 persons.

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

The total number of war-risk insurance claims filed from the beginning of the bureau to March 31, 1921, was 153,207; of this number 138,822 have been allowed. The sum of $198,405,907.95 has been paid to 138,822 persons since the beginning of the bureau and up to March 31, 1921.

The total amount of United States Government life insurance claims allowed to date are 421—death 389, disability 32. The sum of $1,211,425.78 has been paid to 421 persons on United States Government life insurance policies from the beginning of the bureau up to March 31, 1921.

Up to March 31, 1921, there have been filed with the bureau 599,239 compensation claims. Of this number 308,484 were allowed and 197,142 disallowed. The sum of $202,995,308.29 has been paid as compensation to 308,484 persons.

HOSPITALIZATION.

The number of examinations of claimants for compensation, including reexaminations, totaled 777,511 on March 31, 1921. The total number of admittance cards issued for hospital treatment to April 1 was 119,679. Of this number 60,525 were for the United States Public Health Service hospitals, 59,154 for hospitals of the War and Navy Departments, the soldiers' homes and private contract hospitals.

The number remaining in hospitals, both private and Government, on March 31, 1921, was 25,144. It is reported that cases for hospitalization are increasing at the rate of about 1,000 per month and that the demand for hospitalization will probably reach the peak in about five or six years and then will gradually decline, and that in the course of 25 or 30 years the hospitalization program will be practically completed.

It will always be necessary, of course, to furnish care and treatment to certain of the disabled ex-service men, but this will be carried on in Government hospitals and soldiers' homes.

In the sundry civil appropriation act making appropriations for expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and other purposes, which was approved March 4, 1921, $33,000,000 was appropriated for medical and hospital services.

The above figures show that while the total eligible for section 2 for whom training was feasible was 114,584, that 81,481 had entered training, leaving a difference of 33,103. On March 15 the districts reported that 5,467 men who were eligible for section 2 training had declined to accept and that 15,402 had deferred their training until a later date. The others had been offered training if they would accept it. The Government is ready when the man is found and is ready.

On March 15, 3,123 men are reported as having completed training and 7,370 as having discontinued. Approximately 50 per cent of the latter have entered employment as a result of training, this in addition to the 3,123 definitely reported as rehabilitated or completed; 723 have died while in training.

Up to March 1, 1921, the board has spent $89,521,414.24 since the passage of the rehabilitation act on June 17, 1918, two and a half years ago.

The second deficiency appropriation bill, which passed the House on May 26, 1921, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, carried an appropriation of $15,000,000 for vocational training.

I wish to make the following general observations: All the above legislation was passed by Congress before the World War was legally ended. All the above legislation was initiated and passed by the House.

It is the first time in the history of our country that general pension legislation has been passed during the war. General pension legislation heretofore has been enacted after the war. It is the first time in the history of our Government that allowances have been paid to the dependents of soldiers while they were actually engaged in the war. It is the first time that our Government has granted war-risk insurance to soldiers engaged in war. It is the first time that our Government or any other Government, so far as I know, has granted free hospitalization to disabled ex-service men. It is the first time in the history of our Government or any other Government that vocational training has been granted free to disabled ex-service men. It is the first time in the history of our Government that ex-service men, while they were receiving free vocational training, also received $80 per month, and in addition thereto their families have received liberal allowances for their maintenance and support during the period of such training. Never before in our history has our Government granted more liberal compensation or pensions to disabled ex-service men than is now provided in the laws passed by Congress for the benefit of the disabled men of the World War.

I submit the foregoing facts for your candid consideration. I have endeavored to state them fairly and impartially. I do not believe that it can be seriously contended that Congress has been remiss in its duty to the Nation's defenders. I do not believe that the House of Representatives can be charged with indifference as to the claims of those who are entitled to assistance from the Government because of misfortunes that befell them on account of their service in the World War. I also know that it is not the intention of the Members of Congress to falter in their efforts to pass proper legislation to accomplish and carry out the great program that it had inaugurated in regard to compensation, insurance, hospitalization, and vocational training.

"A nation that will not defend its defenders and protect its protectors is a disgrace to the map of the world." [Applause.]

Every important witness that came before our committee when we were considering the legislation that is now before the House stated without hesitation that they had no criticism of Congress or its Members for the legislation that had been passed. Their criticism went to the administration of the laws passed by Congress. Their criticism was of the agencies that were furnishing the service to the disabled veterans of the World War.

The legislation that we are now considering is presented for the purpose of curing, if possible, the defects in the administration of the laws passed by Congress, so that the ex-service men will speedily receive the benefits to which Congress believes they are justly and honestly entitled.

The bill has received careful consideration and everyone who has been interested in this legislation has had an opportunity to come before the committee and make such statement as he desired. The hearings began last January on what was known as the Rogers bill and other bills, and continued up to May 4, 1921. The whole committee gave the bill six days' consideration in executive session.

It is not claimed by those who are supporting this legislation that it will cure all defects in the administration of the laws passed by Congress for the benefit of disabled ex-service men.

In my judgment the time has come when those who are administering the agencies for the benefit of disabled ex-service men must display some backbone. In other words, the administration must not be invertebrate.

Compensation and insurance claims should be passed upon carefully. There must be some stability about the decisions rendered. The Government must be protected and the disabled ex-service men must be protected.

It is hoped by those who are sponsoring this legislation that it will have a tendency to make the ex-service men feel that the Government is endeavoring to treat them fairly and justly.

I now wish to take up and briefly analyze each section of the bill.

It may be generally stated that the first 14 sections of the bill provide for the establishment in the Treasury Department of a new bureau, to be known as the veterans' bureau, the director of which shall be an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

which shall be an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

The first 14 sections of the bill provide for the consolidation into one bureau in the Treasury Department the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and so much of the Public Health Service as relates to the examination, assignment to hospitals, and welfare of persons who served in the World War and are now or have been patients of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance or of the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education.

It is the opinion of your committee, and in fact every committee that has examined into the governmental agencies established for the benefit of the disabled ex-service men of the country, that the service to be rendered should be unified and brought under the control of one bureau.

Complaints were made to your committee that delays in allotment, allowance, compensation, and insurance claims were largely due to the manner in which these agencies have been administered; that there is too much red tape and division of authority.

The consolidation of these agencies, it is believed, will bring about a more thorough business organization and will greatly add to the efficiency of the service to be rendered to disabled ex-service men. At the head of the bureau is a director, who will be responsible for the organization of the bureau, and who will have complete supervision and control over the property and personnel, and who will have authority to adopt rules and regulations for the carrying out of the purposes of the act.

Every business organization is largely dependent upon its management for success. In fact, it has been said that 95 per cent of the success of a business enterprise is founded upon management. The form of government of every business concern is a monarchy in which practically all power is vested in one man or set of men; an oligarchy, so to speak, of kindred spirits

It has been estimated that the governmental agencies for the benefit of ex-service men are expending about $1,000,000 per day. This large sum is distributed daily by these agencies in the form of allowances, compensation, insurance, prosthetic appliances, hospitalization, vocational training, administration, and in other ways.

The complaints coming to your committee have not been as to laws that have been passed by Congress for the disabled exservice men or neglect of Congress to pass proper laws, but as to the manner in which they have been administered. It is believed by your committee that when these agencies are consolidated, as provided in the bill, that the disabled exservice men of the country will receive a more expeditious handling and careful consideration of their compensation and attention, hospitalization, and vocational training.

The bill makes provision, in addition to the centralization at Washington, for the decentralization in the field. Provision is made for the establishment of 14 regional offices and such suboffices, not exceeding 50 in number, as may be deemed necessary by the director, in the best interests of the work committed to the veterans' bureau and to carry out the purposes of this act. At these regional offices all the work of receiving applications, hearing complaints, holding examinations, passing on awards, and other routine work and investigations will be made for the proper and expeditious determination of compensation and insurance claims and the furnishing of hospital care and vocational training and other benefits to which the exservice men are justly entitled under the laws passed by Congress. Each of said regional offices would be administratively complete in itself for its territory.

The suboffices will be auxiliary to the regional offices and shall have such powers as may be delegated to them by the director, except to make compensation and insurance awards and to grant vocational training.

The bureau would thus be completely decentralized, except for the general administration and final accounting. The original records of all activities concerned would remain in Washington, while copies or working cards would be retained at the various regional offices and suboffices.

There would be no division of responsibility or authority, which has been the source of the large number of complaints regarding the Government's present handling of the problems of the ex-service men. In each regional office the men in charge will be responsible for maintaining proper and economic service, and examinations for awards, for making payments, for hospitalization, vocational training, and all other matters involved.

All questions, in so far as possible, will be settled at the point of origin, near, or in the presence of the men concerned, doing away with the necessity of all the intermediary personnel and equipment now required.

Appeals undoubtedly will be possible from the regional offices to the office at Washington and, if necessary, subject to final review by the director.

All original papers will be kept on file at Washington, after being checked onto the individual working cards in the regional offices and suboffices.

The Arlington Building will house completely all of the central office activities.

The director will have complete responsibility for the proper administration of the central office at Washington and all the regional offices and suboffices throughout the country. He will be responsible for the organization of the bureau and will have the power and authority to bring to his assistance such medical advisers and technical experts as will be necessary to meet all administrative problems and intelligently perfect and establish a thoroughgoing business administration of all these governmental agencies established for the benefit of disabled ex-service men.

Section 1 of the bill provides for the establishment in the Treasury Department of a bureau to be known as the veterans' bureau, the director of which shall be an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in addition to those otherwise provided by law, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum. The powers and duties pertaining to the office of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance are transferred to the director of the veterans' bureau. It is also provided that there shall be included on the technical and administrative staff of the director such staff officers, experts, and assistants as the director shall prescribe. There shall be in the veterans' bureau such sections and subdivisions thereof as the director shall prescribe.

Section 2 provides that the director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall administer, execute, and enforce the provisions of this act, and for that purpose shall have full power and authority to make rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, but which are necessary or appropriate to carry out its purposes, and shall decide all questions arising under this act, except as otherwise provided.

Section 3 provides that the functions, powers, and duties conferred by existing law upon the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education be transferred to and made a part of the veterans' bureau.

Section 4 provides for the transfer to the veterans' bureau of all personnel, facilities, property, and equipment, including leases, contracts, and other obligations and instrumentalities of all the aforesaid agencies referred to in section 3 of the bill, including all that part of the United States Public Health Service which relates to the examination and assignment to hospitals of persons who are now or have been patients or beneficiaries of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and as described and provided in a written order of the Treasury Department issued and signed by the Secretary of the Treasury on April 19, 1921, and designated "Order relative to the transfer of certain activities of the United States Public Health Service, relating to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, including the trainees of the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education."

Such a transfer would involve one class of personnel which now has a right to certain rank, grade, pay, and allowances, and a right to certain rules of promotion; this class is the commissioned personnel of the United States Public Health Service. It is a class of men by themselves, composed exclusively of expert physicians and surgeons, and its personnel will not be in conflict as to character of work or as to essentials of school preparation with any other personnel, inasmuch as this section provides that all personnel performing the same or similar duties shall be maintained under the same rules as to rank and grade, pay and allowances and promotion.

Section 5 provides for the transfer to the veterans' bureau of all records, files, documents, correspondence, and other papers relating to the service rendered or to be rendered by the United States Public Health Service in the medical examination and assignment to hospitals of persons who served in the World War and who are now or have been patients or beneficiaries of the aforesaid agencies referred to in section 3 of this bill.

Section 5 also provides for the transfer to the Veteran's Bureau of all records, files, documents, correspondence, and other papers in the possession of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and those which as a result of the administration of the act of June 27, 1918, and amendments thereto are in the possession of the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education.

Section 6: This is the decentralization section, providing for a central office in the District of Columbia, and 14 regional offices and not to exceed 50 suboffices, as are required, to carry on the work. Such regional offices may exercise such powers for hearing complaints and for examining, rating, and awarding compensation claims, granting medical, surgical, dental, and hospital care, convalescent care, and necessary and reasonabla aftercare, making insurance awards, granting vocational training, and all other matters delegated to them by the director as could be performed lawfully under this act by the central office. Such suboffices shall have such powers as may be delegated to them by the director except to make compensation and insurance awards, and to grant vocational training.

Section 7: This section makes the beneficiaries of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, the beneficiaries of the veterans' bureau.

Section 8: This section transfers to the new bureau the funds heretofore appropriated for the use of the bureau which are by this act consolidated in the one bureau.

Section 9 places under the direction of the bureau the responsibility for the proper examination, medical care, treatment, hospitalization, dispensary and convalescent care, necessary and reasonable aftercare, welfare of, nursing, vocational training, and such other services as may be necessary in carrying out the purposes of this act.

The director is authorized to utilize the now existing or future facilities of the United States Public Health Service, the War Department, the Navy Department, the Interior Department, and the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and such other governmental facilities as will be made available for the purposes set forth in this act. The aforesaid governmental agencies are authorized and directed to furnish such facilities, including personnel, equipment, medical, surgical, and hospital services, as the director may deem necessary and advisable. In order to standardize the character of the examination, medical care and treatment, hospitalization, nursing, vocational training, and other services as may be necessary for the beneficiaries of this act, the director shall maintain an inspection service for the purpose of ascertaining whether the beneficiaries of this act are receiving the proper hospitalization, care, and

In the event that there is not sufficient governmental hospital and other facilities for the proper medical care and treatment of beneficiaries under this act the director may recommend to the Secretary of the Treasury the further improvement or extension of existing governmental facilities or the acquiring of additional facilities in the form of new structures, and such permanent equipment when so acquired shall become a part of the existing agencies of the Government, including the War Department, Navy Department, Interior Department, Treasury Department, and National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Sol-

This section also provides that the director may contract with State, municipal, or private hospitals for such medical, surgical. and hospital services and supplies as may be required, and such contracts may be made for the period of not exceeding 10 years and may be for the use of a ward or other hospital unit, or on such other basis as may be in the best interests of the beneficiaries under this act.

Section 10 provides that for the purpose of this act the director is authorized to detail from time to time clerks or persons employed in the bureau, to make examinations into the merits of compensation and insurance claims, and to aid in the preparation, presentation, or examination of such claims. Any such persons so detailed shall have the power to administer oaths, take affidavits, and certify to the correctness of papers and documents pertaining to the administration of this act.

It frequently occurs that it is necessary for field representatives to obtain affidavits for the purpose of determining the accuracy and justice of claims presented, or to obtain true copies of official papers, for which payment is now made by the Government. This section would authorize such representatives as would be designated by the director to examine persons, to take affidavits or statements under oath, and the Government would thus be relieved of this added inconvenience and ex-

Section 11 provides that the director of the veterans bureau is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary in order to promote good conduct on the part of persons who are receiving care or treatment in hospitals, homes, or institutions as patients of said bureau during their stay in such hospitals, homes, or institutions. Penalties for the breach of such rules and regulations may extend to a forfeiture by the offender of such portion of the compensation payable to him, not exceeding three-fourths of the monthly installments per month for three months, for a breach com-mitted while receiving treatment in such hospital, home, or institution as may be prescribed by such rules and regulations. This provision is placed in the law for the purpose of maintaining discipline among the patients who are receiving care or treatment in the hospitals as patients of the veterans' bureau.

bureau as inmates of hospitals may allot portions of their compensation to any person or persons they may direct. It also makes provision for depositing with the Secretary of the Treasury a certain amount of their compensation which may draw interest at the rate of 31 per cent per annum, payable for no period, however, of less than six months.

Sections 202 and 203 of the war risk insurance act provide that an enlisted man subject to such conditions and limitations as may be prescribed under regulations to be made by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, may allot any portion or portions of his monthly pay, after the compulsory allotment is made, to such person or persons as he may direct, and that in case one-half of the enlisted man's monthly pay is not allotted the regulations may require that any proportion of such one-half that is not allotted shall be deposited to the credit of the enlisted man and bear interest at the same rate as United States bonds bear for the same period.

There are now no existing provisions of law which permit patients of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance who are inmates of a hospital and who in most instances are receiving a monthly sum of compensation greater in amount than their former pay as enlisted men to allot their compensation, or if they do not desire to use the money while they are being cared for in the Government hospital, to leave the compensation to their credit with the United States at interest. It seems highly desirable to authorize a procedure in cases of compensation similar to that previously authorized in case of pay. Aside from the great inconvenience it affords to the war-risk beneficiaries, in many cases it is found to be desirable from the standpoint of the Government, because in practice the monthly payment of the full compensation in cash to the inmates of a large hospital frequently results in an extravagant and immediate disposition of the money by the patients in ways which seem to give them small practical benefit and which result in weakening the morale and general discipline of the hospital. If the inmates are permitted and encouraged either to allot their compensation or to leave it, this situation would perhaps not arise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa

has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman wish additional time?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SWEET. I would be glad to have 15 minutes. Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes now, and if the gentleman needs more time I will yield to him again.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 15 minutes more.

Mr. SWEET. Section 13 provides, in addition to the care, treatment, and appliances now authorized by law, that the veterans bureau shall furnish, without charge therefor, hospital, dental, medical, surgical, and convalescent care and treatment and prosthetic appliances for any honorably discharged commissioned officer or enlisted man or any member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) disabled by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted, or by reason of any aggravation of a preexisting injury or disease while in the service of the United States on or after April 6, 1917, provided that the application for such care, treatment, and appliances shall be made within one year from the date of his discharge from the service or from the date this act goes into effect, whichever is the later.

Section 14 provides that the director shall file with the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate on the first day of the next regular session after this act takes effect an itemized account of all expenditures made under this act, including names, classifications, and salaries of all staff officers, experts, assistants, and employees. The director is also required thereafter to make a report to Congress of his doings under this act for the preceding fiscal year.

This section was placed in the bill so that Congress might obtain full information as to the manner and extent of the organization of the new bureau under the provisions of this act.

Section 15 provides that as to converted insurance the cash surrender value thereof, if any, on the date of discharge or dismissal shall be paid the insured if living and if dead to the designated beneficiary.

Under section 29 of the war-risk insurance act a person discharged from the military or naval forces for desertion, mutiny, treason, or spying, and so forth, loses all his rights to insurance and compensation. In compensation and yearly renewable term Section 12 provides that the patients or beneficiaries of the insurance, where there is not a vested or property right, this seems veterans' bureau who are receiving treatment through such the premium rates are fixed so that the insured secures a certain cash surrender value in his policy as time goes on. It is believed that to attempt to cancel his right to this cash surrender value would be in violation of the constitutional injunction against deprivation of property without due process of law and contrary to accepted jurisprudence. Accordingly this section would give such a person his cash surrender value, his property right to his insurance.

Section 16 makes provision for the benefit of those who applied for enlistment or enrollment in the military or naval forces and who were accepted provisionally and directed or ordered to the camp, post, station, or other place for final acceptance in such service. Such persons shall be considered to be in active service during the period while they are complying with such order or direction and during such compliance and until their final acceptance or rejection for enlistment or enrollment into the military or naval forces and shall be entitled to the compensation and insurance benefits of the war-risk insurance act.

Provision has heretofore been made for those who were "inducted into the service by the local draft board after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who while in such service and before being accepted and enrolled for active military or naval service becomes totally or permanently disabled or dies without having applied for insurance shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each."

Provision is also made that any insurance application made by a person after induction by a local draft board, but before being accepted and enrolled for active service, shall be deemed valid.

Section 16 of the bill extends the benefits of the war risk insurance act under certain conditions to the men who voluntarily applied for enlistment in the military or naval forces and were accepted provisionally.

Section 17 of the act relieves the bureau from the recovery of allotments and allowances erroneously paid, except where it is shown that the person receiving the allowance does not bear the relationship to the enlisted man which is required by the war risk insurance act, and except also in cases of manifest fraud.

The Treadway amendment exonerated the bureau from the obligation of recovering allotment and allowance payments to dependents when investigation disclosed that the condition of dependency has changed, without notice to the bureau.

There are, however, many other contingencies which the Treadway amendment does not cover wherein it seems desirable as a matter of policy and as a matter of equity that the bureau be not obliged to make further recoveries. For example, the dependents of soldiers are not entitled under the law to payments of allotment and allowance for any period after his death or for any period of more than one month after his discharge. Because of tardy receipt of advice as to these happenings the bureau has in a great many instances made overpayments through lack of this information. When a soldier was killed in battle, frequently many months elapsed before official and final notification of the fact arrived. In addition to cases of this sort, where the bureau was not advised of a change in the status of the soldier, there were of necessity many cases where the bureau has not received prompt information as to the change of status of an allottee. The marriage of a minor child, the divorce of a wife, the death of an allottee, or the discontinuance by the soldier of his class B allotment all involve, under the law, an immediate suspension of the award. Because of inevitable delay in receipt of information and the time required for the necessary administrative action a great many payments have been continued beyond the period author-

In view of the expense to the Government of endeavoring to make further collections of overpayments of the kind above outlined and in view of the hardship such a procedure generally entails to persons who have received the overpayments, many of whom are now unable to make restitution and most of whom accepted the payments in perfect good faith, recovery should not be sought except where the person has received an allowance through fraud or where a person does not bear the relationship to the enlisted man required by the war risk insurance act.

Section 18 provides not only that compensation shall be paid to the commissioned officer or enlisted man or his dependents in case of death or disability, but compensation may be paid the commissioned officer or enlisted man or his dependents for an aggravation of a disability existing prior to examination, acceptance, and enrollment for service, when such aggravation was suffered and contracted in line of duty on and after April 6, 1917.

Section 300 of the war risk insurance act, as amended December 24, 1919, provides that any person who was admitted into the service should, by reason of that fact, be regarded as in sound health.

Many men were taken into service in whom diseases or defects were not detected at time of examination, but which were brought rapidly to head when the arduous work of training It may be that during an emergency when men were drafted into the service the attitude of regarding all accepted men as sound was justified, but it has caused the payment of a large amount of money and it seems doubtful if this policy should be continued hereafter, while voluntary enlistments are accepted, for the tendency will be to encourage the enlistment of men with known latent diseases and defects so that they may shift the care of these diseases and defects upon the Government, where it does not belong. To correct this, section 18 would amend section 300 of the war risk insurance act to provide that in the case of persons discharged after passage of this act the presumption of soundness would not exist automatically and that persons thereafter entering the military or naval service should be compensable only for such diseases or injuries or aggravations thereof as are actually suffered in the military or naval service; excepting that persons taken into service on or before the armistice and who have not yet been discharged shall continue to be held to have been in sound health at entrance.

Under the act as it now stands all the compensation payments, including the amount granted to ex-service persons and the amount granted their beneficiaries, either wife, children, or parents, must be given to the man, except where his wife or children are living apart from him, when it may be apportioned. There are many instances of dependent parents whose ex-service children are mentally incompetent, and in their case there is a great deal of difficulty in having the extra amounts payable under the law for such dependent parents reach the persons for whom they are intended. This amendment also permits separation of the award so that the portion for parents may be sent to them where such division of payments is deemed necessary.

Section 19 is to clarify section 305 of the war risk insurance act, which does not now set forth clearly when an increase in award made upon revision shall take effect.

Section 305 of the war risk insurance act of October 6, 1917, permits the bureau, acting upon its own motion or upon application, to revise an award previously made in accordance with the facts found and to increase or diminish such award. The section is not sufficiently clear as to whether an increase of the award made upon revision may be made to correspond with the date of the increased physical disability of the soldier in accordance with the true state of facts, or whether the increased award can be effective only from the date on which the new revised award is made.

It is highly desirable that it be made clear, because it would be inequitable to the ex-service men if the bureau were estopped in making its reratings from giving a rating corresponding both in degree of disability and in date of the inception of the disability or the increased disability in accordance with the true facts of each individual case. This is especially true because in the past it has been necessary in handling thousands of cases to make a preliminary award, despite the fact that complete data was not in hand, when the data available clearly indicated that the claimant had suffered some disability. Furthermore, in many ailments, such as tuberculosis and mental and nervous diseases, it is frequently impossible to fix with precision the exact degree of disability until experience and treatment have revealed the patient's true condition. Experience has taught that many ratings made pursuant to the incomplete examinations of physicians throughout the country have been found in practice to be inaccurate and consequently unfair to the claimant, who is properly entitled under the war risk insurance act to compensation for the true degree of disability without being penalized for errors in diagnosis, inadequacy of medical evidence submitted, and administrative delays or errors arising in part from the large number of cases under consideration.

Section 20 extends the period for obtaining a certificate from the director to the effect that the injured person at the time of his discharge or resignation was suffering from injury likely to result in death or disability.

It further provides for the extension of the period during which such certificate may be obtained for one year after the passage of this act. Under the law as it now stands the disabled person has one year from the date of discharge in which to obtain such certificate.

A large number of ex-service men, through ignorance of their rights or knowledge of how to proceed, have failed to procure the certificate of disability provided for in section 306 of the war risk insurance act. That act provided that such certificate must be obtained within one year from discharge. Members in the House and Senate have declared this time is too short, and experience has shown that this view is correct.

Section 21 is an amendment to subsection 2 of section 313 of the war risk insurance act by adding thereto subsection 2a.

The veterans' bureau is authorized to pay the beneficiary or other person or persons in whose name an action may have been commenced or prosecuted fees and mileage the same as is now paid the witnesses in the United States court in going to, remaining at, and returning from the place of trial without regard to the court where the action is brought.

It is also provided in this section that in all cases of assignment of causes of action under section 313, whether the assignment be heretofore or hereafter made, where it shall appear to the director to be to the best interests of the person so to do, the director acting in the name of the United States, may assign the cause of action back to the beneficiary or his personal representative

Section 22 provides that where a beneficiary at the time of designation by the insured is within the permitted class of beneficiaries and is the designated beneficiary at the time of the maturity of the insurance, because of the death of the insured, such beneficiary shall be deemed to be within the permitted class, even though the status of such beneficiary shall have been changed.

In practice it has frequently occurred that the insured in his lifetime has designated a person who was then in the permitted class, such for example as a stepmother. Subsequent events occurring before the death of the insured, as the death of the insured's father, without issue, technically changed the status of the stepmother, so that at the time of the death of the insured she is not, under the law as interpreted by the Attorney General in an opinion of June 21, 1920, still legally his stepmother. It therefore becomes impossible to make an award to her at the insured's death.

Section 22 is placed in the bill to remedy this situation, which results in the defeat of the clearly expressed intent of the insured as to the person to receive his insurance.

Section 23 provides that in cases where the insured whose yearly renewable term insurance has matured by reason of total permanent disability is found to be no longer totally and permanently disabled and where the insured is required under regulations to renew payment of premiums on said term insurance, and where this contingency has extended beyond the five-year period during which said yearly renewable term insurance otherwise must be converted, there shall be given such insured an additional period of two years from the date on which he is required to renew payment of premiums in which to convert said term insurance, as hereinbefore provided.

Section 24 is practically the same as section 6 of the Wason bill, which passed the House and Senate. Any person holding term insurance may convert this into United States Government life insurance without medical examination, whereupon all death claims must be paid out of the converted or United States Government life insurance fund. This fund is made up wholly from premiums paid by the insured ex-service persons on their converted insurance. It follows that if a soldier disabled by cause of the hazards of war converts his term insurance and dies as a result of the war hazard, under present circumstances this payment is not borne by the United States as the act provided, but instead is shifted to the United States Government life insurance fund. Thus the burden of excess mortality is borne by premiums collected from those persons whose health was not impaired, and it is not borne by the Government as originally provided.

Section 25 provides for cases where the estate of the insured would escheat under the laws of the place of his residence; the insurance shall not be paid to the estate of the insured, but shall escheat to the United States and shall be credited to the United States Government life insurance fund, or military and naval insurance appropriation, as may be proper.

In some States the law would cause the United States Government to pay to the State government insurance for which there were no living beneficiaries. This section is to avoid the practice of paying these funds to the State treasury under these circumstances.

Section 26 for the first time makes provision for the reinstatement of lapsed insurance under certain conditions. Heretofore the question of the reinstatement of lapsed insurance has been a matter entirely under the rules and regulations of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. The question is simply this: Shall persons suffering from injury or disease resulting from the World War, who are not permanently and totally disabled, be permitted to reinstate their lapsed or canceled term insurance or Government life insurance—converted insurance—providing they conform to all the rules, regulations, and requirements relative to the reinstatement, except as to the condition of their health? Your committee, after due consideration, thought it advisable to make this a matter of legislation rather than for departmental regulations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. SWEET. It would appear to be equitable and fair when it is remembered that as a matter of fact in most of the instances the reason the disabled soldier failed to keep up his insurance was that he was short of funds and it took the Government some time to investigate and grant his compensation and that because of this financial stringency he allowed his insurance to lapse.

Section 26 provides, however, that before reinstatement can be accomplished by the applicant he shall be required to pay all back monthly premiums which would have become payable if such insurance had not lapsed.

Section 27 is practically the same as section 5 of the Wason bill as it passed the House and Senate, which relieved from the payment of premiums on yearly renewable term insurance men whose physical condition was such that they could not earn their own livelihood during the period of such inability. This section, however, made this relief rather more general than the evident intent of Congress in creating the original act. It is believed that such relief should be granted ex-service persons while they actually are in a hospital and thus are unable to work, and to persons while they are rated temporarily totally disabled.

Section 27 is the same as section 5 of the Wason bill, excepting that it applied to converted insurance as well as yearly renewable term insurance, and the provision in regard to relief from the payment of premiums by those who are receiving vocational training is stricken out.

Section 28 provides that the Postmaster General is authorized to receive premiums on yearly renewable term insurance and United States Government life insurance—converted insurance—and act for and turn over to the Secretary of the Treasury the money so received. He is also authorized to receive and transmit to the veterans' bureau applications for converted insurance and applications for reinstatement of lapsed insurance. This is to be done under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General may prescribe.

Every soldier, sailor, and marine who desires to pay insurance premiums or desires to make an application for reinstatement of lapsed insurance or for converted insurance may go to the post office at the place of his residence and the post-master will receive the insurance premiums and give him a receipt therefor, and his application for reinstatement or for converted insurance will be transmitted immediately to the veterans' bureau.

Section 29 provides that, subject to the provisions of section 29 of the war risk insurance act and amendments thereto, policies of insurance heretofore or hereafter issued in accordance with article 4 of the war risk insurance act shall be incontestable after six months from the date of issuance or reinstatement except for fraud or nonpayment of premiums.

It is the opinion of your committee that a provision of this kind placed in the law would add stability to the policies issued or hereafter issued by the Government and give assurance that only in case of fraud or nonpayment of premiums would payment of the insurance be denied. A provision similar to this is usually found in the policies issued by private companies and has been found to be mutually beneficial to all concerned.

Representatives of the Treasury Department, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the United States Public Health Service, and the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and certain Members of Congress appeared before your committee during the hearings and approved, in principle, if not technically, without exception, the consolidation of all agencies of the Government for the benefit of the disabled ex-service men of this country and the proposed amendments to the war risk insurance act.

This, I believe, completes a rather careful analysis of the provisions of this bill, and I trust that they will meet with the approval of the Members of the House.

I trust that it will be of benefit to the director of the new bureau and his assistants in the administration of the law and that it will prove to be of inestimable benefit to those who are deeply interested in this class of legislation and to those who rendered valiant service to their country during the great crisis in world affairs. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. FESS. On page 5, section 6, I notice that you retain the central office in the District of Columbia and the 14 regional offices, but you limit the suboffices to not over 50.

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. FESS. The board now in operation has 140 suboffices, with 9 more authorized to be appointed. I presume that-

Mr. SWEET. What are the powers exercised by these suboffices, may I ask the gentleman from Ohio? What are they doing now? What I am getting at is the extent of the work they are doing. In other words, what powers are they exercising at the present time?

Mr. FESS. First, to ascertain whether an applicant is igible to training. That is the first. Second, making the eligible to training. necessary examination for the qualifications or as to the character of training that the party is seeking, and then placing him in it.

Mr. SWEET. Do all of these suboffices pass upon the question of vocational training?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. All over the United States?
Mr. FESS. Yes. If my friend will recall, when there was such a storm of complaint against the board we found by calling service men here in an examination that ran through from March to May that nearly all the complaints were that too much power was centralized in Washington, and that it ought to be decentralized, so that the final findings could be made elsewhere than here in Washington. Since doing that I do not think there has been very much complaint.

Now, the question with me is whether the committee went into this sufficiently. I am wholly in sympathy with the measure. Our committee recommended as one of its recommendations that this decentralization be effected. But the question is whether you have gone into it to see if we could do away with 100 of these subdivisions. You have limited it to 50, and we have now 140.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Iowa yield there, in order that I may ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess]?

Mr. SWEET. Yes. Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Do I understand the gentleman to say that these subofficers working under the rehabilitation division of the central board grant training, or merely conduct examinations and make recommendations?

Mr. FESS. They make recommendations. The final decision in case of dispute is always made there.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If there is a dispute, the final decision is made in Washington?

Mr. FESS. No; I think not. Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. My experience with a case is that where the district at Minneapolis has passed upon a man and approved him, they have submitted the papers to Washington, and-Mr. FESS. That was not a recent case, was it?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That was within the last two months or six weeks.

Mr. FESS. That was the source of complaint that was quite general against the rehabilitation work, that everything had to be done at Washington, and the recommendation was made that they be decentralized, and that the decentralization take the form of district offices, and then, under the district offices, sub-

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It is news to me that any office outside of the central office in Washington actually awarded training.

Mr. FESS. Where there is a dispute that must be submitted to a final tribunal, that is always at Washington.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. You mean, then, that if the facts are rather close the board out in the country does not care to assume responsibility, and will submit it to Washington?

Mr. FESS. They will submit it to the regional office, and the regional office, can give final judgment or can submit it to the Washington office.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That has not been my experience, and it is news to me.

Mr. FESS. My suggestion is that if we can do without so many suboffices it would really be an advantage, but I want to make sure that that has been gone into so as not to deprive this work of its effectiveness as it has been running the last year.

Mr. SWEET. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that after we had reported this bill, which was about six days ago, Mr. Lamkin called me on the phone and stated that they had at the present time 138 what might be termed suboffices.

Mr. FESS. One hundred and forty.
Mr. SWEET. I said to him, "I wish you would write me a letter explaining this situation, and also stating whether or not it would hamper in any way the work that you are now performing at these suboffices." He has not written the letter as yet, but I believe that I will receive it within the next 24 hours. So this is a matter perhaps that ought to be gone into to some extent, but the members of your committee are satisfied that where we make provision for 14 regional offices and not to exceed 50 suboffices, all this work can be thus thoroughly organized. And I want to say that I have no tendency to hamper the work of hospitalization, or vocational training, or anything of that kind.

Mr. FESS. I am sure of that.

Mr. SWEET. But, on the other hand, I think the gentleman from Ohio will agree with me that in establishing these regional offices and suboffices we ought to name the limit and the number that may be established.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman from Ohio agrees with the gentleman from Iowa on that, that wherever they are not needed for the effectiveness of the work they ought to be abandoned; and while it will require the dismissal of the office force of a great number of suboffices, if it can be done without danger I want it done. In Ohio there is one of these suboffices at Cincinnati, another at Columbus, another at Cleveland, another at Toledo, and another at Dayton. I am quite familiar with the Ohio situation and with the Indiana situation. I am not satisfied in my own mind that it would be safe to concentrate all of that work in Ohio in one office. I am seriously in doubt about that. I think it could come nearer being done now than it could a year ago, the work is advanced so well; but I wanted to be sure that the committee had had its attention called to that,

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. SWEET. Certainly.

Mr. RAYBURN. Did not the committee go very thoroughly into this matter, and was it not very thoroughly of the opinion that 14 regional offices and 50 suboffices were enough?

Mr. SWEET. That was what the committee determined after thorough consideration.

Mr. RAYBURN. And were not the committee very much of this opinion, that there ought to be no one who would have the power or the authority to go out and indiscriminately establish regional or suboffices?

Mr. SWEET. That is true.
Mr. RAYBURN. And that there certainly ought to be a limit to the number both of the regional and the suboffices?

Mr. SWEET. Section 6 of the bill provides that the director shall be the one to determine in regard to the establishment of the regional offices and of the suboffices,

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KINDRED. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended-

The CHAIRMAN. Under the agreement the time is in the control of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Winslow] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes mo Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. SWEET. Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS. Referring again to that same section 6, the decentralizing section, which I think is one of the most important and useful in the bill, that section provides that the regional offices as distinguished from the suboffice shall exercise such powers for examining, rating, and awarding compensation claims, and so forth, as could be exercised by the central office.

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. ROGERS. As I caught the observations of the gentleman from Iowa on that section he suggested that the jackets in the particular compensation claims would be retained here in Washington. Is that the fact?

Mr. SWEET. The original papers will probably be sent on here to Washington.

Mr. ROGERS. By the claimant?
Mr. SWEET. Not by the claimant, but by the regional office. Mr. ROGERS. After the regional office has completed its

Mr. SWEET. After the regional office has completed the examination and made the award.

Mr. ROGERS. May I ask why, in the gentleman's opinion, it would be desirable for the papers in a given case to be passed on to Washington instead of being retained in the office in the district where the claimant resides?

Mr. SWEET. The situation is simply this: The whole matter will be under the direction, supervision, and control of the They can be left in the regional office or they can be sent on to Washington. It is a matter of judgment and business administration.

Mr. ROGERS. And the gentleman does not intend to express his view that it will be necessary under the law to send these papers on to Washington?

Mr. SWEET. No; my expression did not go to the necessity My statement simply went to the effect that we are placing the matter of control, management, supervision, and organization under the director of this bureau.

Mr. ROGERS. My impression would be, except in the case of an appeal or a transfer of residence, it would be the smoother thing for the jacket to be held in the office that has the power to make the award and had made the award, and it would be only an exceptional case that it ought to come to Washington. The purpose of the gentleman is to avoid centralization, and in so far as that can be achieved I think it is essential that it should be achieved.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I will,

Mr. HILL. I want to ask a question along that same line. I understand under section 6 that the director has full power to make what regulations he deems best, and that there may be-outside of Washington, at least-14 points that have full and complete power to do everything that can be done in Washington.

Mr. SWEET. The director can delegate to these 14 regional offices such power as he deems proper.

Mr. HILL. He may delegate to the 14 regional offices as full powers as can be exercised in Washington.

Mr. SWEET. He can.

Mr. HILL. And thus there will be 15 points in the United States that can exercise full powers.

Mr. SWEET. Yes

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I will yield to the gentleman from Massa-

Mr. WALSH. Are the provisions in the bill introduced by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Wason] incorporated in this measure?

Mr. SWEET. Mr. WALSH. Bodily?

Mr. SWEET. In some instances word for word.

That bill provided for the establishing out-Mr. WALSH. side of Washington of offices with jurisdiction to pass upon these matters

Mr. SWEET. Section 1 of the Wason bill is the one which established 14 regional offices and such suboffices as may be necessary in the proper administration of the act. Section 6 in this bill takes the place of section 1 of the original Wason

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman and the committee feel that the setting up of 14 offices at various points throughout the country is going to tend to more efficient and prompt action on these matters that come under their jurisdiction?

Mr. SWEET. That was the opinion of the committee after careful consideration.

Mr. WALSH. That with 14 different offices miles from the central director, with jurisdiction to pass on all sorts of claims, you will encourage uniformity of decision on questions and promote speed in the transaction of business?

Mr. SWEET. It was believed that if it was decentralized you could get more efficient service than we get at the present

Mr. WALSH. I think if the gentleman is here a few years from now the committee had better be ready to consider legislation undoing this plan, for that will have to be done.

Mr. SWEET. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts is he in favor of the present inefficient service being continued?

Mr. WALSH. There has always been room for improvement in the service down there, of course, but it seems to me that when we legislate on a subject we ought to legislate in a manner not to permit more opportunities for inefficiency, but to restrict the opportunities for it. By this bill you have 14 opportunities for inefficiency where you have 1 now.

Mr. SWEET. Does not the gentleman from Massachusetts realize that when you get out nearer to the men who are to receive these services the whole matter can be considered better than it can here?

Mr. WALSH. You have had a number of different kinds of rulings and interpretations, and now you are multiplying that by 14.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As a matter of fact, under the present system, one man does not pass upon all the claims any-

Mr. SWEET. Certainly not. Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. After the provision for 14 regional directors there will be no more minds passing on the different matters or questions than there are at present, only they will be located in different places.

Mr. STAFFORD. There will be 14 different heads.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Not at all; there is but one head, and that will be the director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in Washington. No one pretends that one director passes on all the matters now.

OHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Did I understand the gentleman from Iowa correctly as saying that the regional offices will exercise the various powers in the event that they are delegated by the director to do so?

Mr. SWEET. Yes; if he so directs.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do not think the effect of section 6 is that the regional offices shall get their authority from the direction of the control of the contro tor to exercise these powers. It seems to me that the act itself gives the regional offices the right to exercise the power. I call attention to line 20, page 5: "and all other matters delegated to them by the director as could be performed lawfully under this act by the central office." These words relate to all other matters in addition to those not enumerated. As to the suboffices, they shall have such power as is delegated by the director. But I do not think, as I read the section, that there shall be any delegation by the director to the regional offices.

Mr. SWEET. I think the gentleman misreads section 6.
Mr. DENISON. I think the part of the sentence preceding that expresses the intention.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The whole sentence reads as follows:

Such regional offices may exercise such powers for hearing complaints and for examining, rating, and awarding compensation claims, granting medical, surgical, dental, and hospital care, convalescent care, and necessary and reasonable aftercare, making insurance awards, granting vocational training, and all other matters delegated to them by the director as could be performed lawfully under this act by the central office.

Is not that an authority in this law to the regional office to perform these acts?

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. KINDRED. I listened intently to the gentleman's statement of the provisions of the bill, thinking that I might hear something which would relate to what I think is a fundamental

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes more to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, I refer now to the matter of medical examinations by the medical boards. That is a fundamental matter to the claimant. I have had claimants and I pre-sume other Members have had, the basis of whose disability arose after their discharge or after the 12 months' period provided for.

Mr. SWEET. And they had not obtained a certificate.

Mr. KINDRED. What I want to get at is this: It is such an important matter in my mind that I hoped it would be made a matter of legislative regulation as well as departmental regulation. In other words, the boards of review ought to be provided for as fully as possible, since the medical findings are so fundamental to the whole system, and particularly fundamental to the rights of the claimants.

Mr. SWEET. Provision is made in this bill extending the period when one who has been disabled may obtain a certificate. In other words, we extend that period for one year from the date of the passage of this act. Under the present law it is one year from the date of his discharge, and we extend it one year from the date of his discharge or one year from the passage of this act, whichever is the later.

Mr. KINDRED. The only question there is that there are certain very insidious diseases, the basis for which exists even before the year's time, and the full symptoms of which develop after the year's time. That would give the claimant no opportunity for justice

Mr. SWEET. This opens it up, so that he will have an opportunity.

Mr. KINDRED. Is the interest of the claimant in these cases fully safeguarded by providing every possible medical board of Mr. SWEET. We have extended the time for one year from the passage of this act, so that everyone who has been disabled, who can trace that disability back to his active service, may have an opportunity to file a certificate and preserve his rights.

Mr. KINDRED. That would include most cases, but I fear it would not include all.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It occurs to me that section 11 might be subject to a very bad interpretation. That provides the penalty that may be applied to a boy who violates a rule prescribed by the director.

Mr. SWEET. Yes; that is the section put in there for disci-

nline

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman tell me who is to determine when the boy has violated the rules?

Mr. SWEET. The director is authorized to prescribe the rules and regulations, and in these rules and regulations he probably will designate the person or persons who will pass on the question of whether the boy has violated the rules of the

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Suppose he would prescribe that an Army hospital had the right to determine that question, and the boy would get into the hands of a drum-head court.

Mr. SWEET. There is a possibility of that, but so many instances were called to our attention in which young men who were in the hospital and receiving compensation-we will say $80 a month or more-would go down town without leave, become intoxicated, and upon their return would make trouble at the hospital and destroy the good order of the hospital. We concluded some provision of this kind should be included in the bill.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Would the gentleman have any objection to making that specific by saying that the director must pass upon this violation, and that the boy may have an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury? That would safeguard the boy from getting into the hands of some one who might ride him to death and take away three-fourths of his money for three months.

Mr. SWEET. Of course, I do not want any injustice done to anyone in the hospital.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Does not the gentleman think that amendment would take care of that situation?

Mr. SWEET. I think the gentleman is going too far, for the reason that the director has a good many things to look after now, and if every one of these cases for an infraction of hospital discipline were presented to him, he would be doing nothing else

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Does the gentleman think the boy should have a right to an appeal in that case?

Mr. SWEET. I think there would be no harm in an appeal. Mr. ANDREWS. Would it not be necessary to locate disciplinary officer in the hospital itself instead of going a long distance away for somebody else to administer discipline?

Mr. SWEET. We have left that to be established under proper rules and regulations prescribed by the director.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. In doing so does the gentleman not think the boy is liable to get into the hands of those who will ride him and punish him?

Mr. SWEET. I think if we have the right man as director there will be no trouble.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I do not think it ought to be left to any one man's discretion.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. I listened with unusual interest to what the gentleman had to say in explanation of the bill, and I was endeavoring to see whether or not the bill would reach a certain class of cases which I think are very meritorious. For instance, we will say that an honorably discharged soldier dies within four months after his discharge, that he had a $10,000 insurance policy, but had paid no premium between the date of his discharge and the date of his death. The Government, we will say, owed the soldier the $60 bonus. I understand that under existing law the bonus due the soldier could not be applied toward the payment of his premium,

Mr. SWEET. That is true at the present time.

Mr. RHODES. I want to know if there is any provision in this proposed legislation that would reach a case of that character?

Mr. SWEET. There is not. Mr. RHODES. Does not the Does not the gentleman believe, as a matter of equity and right, that the law ought to provide that whatever funds may be due the soldier should be applied on the premium due to discharge and arrearage there might be on account of his failure to pay the insurance premium?

Mr. SWEET. On its face the gentleman's proposition would seem to be equitable.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that this $60 bonus which the Government has belongs to the soldier and is his property. What right has the Government to take that money which belongs to the service man and, without his consent or authority, apply it on an insurance premium that is due to the Government, providing the service man desires to keep up his insurance, which he has let lapse?

Mr. RHODES. The same right that the Government had to retain from his monthly pay a sufficient sum to make the payments during his service.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is an entirely different situation. Here is a man who has received a discharge. He has a credit of money due him from the Government which belongs to him, and to him alone.

Now, if you give the authoritiy to take that money and apply it to his insurance premium, do not you think that when the man heard of it that he could not come in and recover all of this bonus, disregarding the application the Government had made?

Mr. RHODES. I concede that under the law that is true, and that is the thing about which I complain. I insist that the proposed legislation should make provision for just such cases as a matter of equity which are not reached under existing law or by this bill.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But the moment you follow out your suggestion you make compulsory insurance, and you compel a man, providing the Government happens to be owing money, to carry his insurance.

Mr. RHODES. It does nothing more than this, that it reaches rare cases which should be met, and I know of no way in which that situation can be met except through this proposed legislation.

Mr. SWEET. I will say, further, that when this question came up in the first instance the Government did apply the bonus in the payment of back premiums where he had allowed his insurance policy to lapse, and, following the line of thought as suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota, they afterwards reversed their position, so that at present if a boy is entitled to a bonus that bonus is not applied toward the payment of his insurance premium to keep the insurance from lapsing.

Mr. RHODES. But your committee did consider this question in the preparation of this bill.

Mr. SWEET. Yes; this matter was gone over. In fact, it has been up a number of times in connection with this legislation. It came up during the consideration of the Wason bill.

Mr. ROBSION. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SWEET. I will yield.

Mr. ROBSION. Going back to section 11 in reference to the proposition of penalties. Now, if the soldier has been awarded a compensation, does the gentleman think we have the right and power to say that some doctor or some attendant can take that compensation from him because he violated some rule of the institution? Upon what theory of law can you take the soldier's compensation?

Mr. SWEET. We are in this situation: The Government is furnishing free hospitalization and, of course, the compensation is a gratuity; it is a donation from the Government to the soldier.

Mr. ROBSION. It is provided by law because of injuries he has received

Mr. SWEET. Every one who is confined in a hospital is there for his betterment, and for the betterment of the others. Now, in order that they should have proper discipline, in order that they may get the best out of whatever there is in the hospital, this provision is put into the bill.

Mr. ROBSION. But he is entitled to his compensation under the law when it is awarded to him, and if he is taking treatment and violates the rules of the institution would not the proper penalty be that he would be denied the use of the institution, but when you take his compensation, many times will not you take it away from his wife and children?

Mr. SWEET. What the gentleman has suggested is just what happens now. For instance, a man is in a hospital. He is not required to stay there. Now, you may say to him if he does not conduct himself properly, "You leave the hospital." Now, I do not want the hospital authorities to say to a young man who is disabled and who may be impaired in intellect and does not rise to the standard of a reasonable man, I do not want the hospital authorities to say to him, "Get out of here." I want the fellow to stay there, and for them to have supervision over him while he is at the hospital, and we put this provision in the bill for the purpose of maintaining, if possible, correct discipline in the

Mr. ROBSION. But if he was suffering from an impairment of mind and is not his normal self, then what authority of justice or law is there to take from him his compensation under those conditions?

Mr. SWEET. It is just a matter of discipline; that is all. Mr. ROBSION. But has the Congress the power to take from a man compensation when it has once been established and allowed by law because of his conduct?

Mr. SWEET. As a parallel case, at the homes for soldiers of the Civil War, Congress has directed in certain cases that the money be sent direct to the homes and the authorities at the homes withhold part of it for a time. Perhaps they do not penalize him-

Mr. ROBSION. But they do hold it out until he recovers and then turn it over to him, but here we are taking it away

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield again, I can understand why there should be some penalty and I agree that it would be a proper penalty to take away a gratuity given to him if he has violated the rules and regulations, but the point I am complaining about is that the bill ought to provide who is to pass upon the question of whether he has violated the rules and regulations or not. I do not want the man to become a victim to some one who has got it in for him, and I think it is the duty of the Congress to say that he not only should have the right to have his case reviewed by the director, but that the Secretary of the Treasury should review it upon application made. I think the boys' interests should be safeguarded, because the gentleman knows what trouble we have had with these hospitals in reference to these boys kept in them. They go there to secure special treatment and they have to depend upon somebody else's care for their treatment, and I think it ought to be provided here that no hospital attendant or school-teacher could pass upon a proposition so vital to his future without there being a higher authority pass upon it.

Mr. RANKIN. Would not the director of the veterans' bureau or the Secretary of the Treasury have the right, at any rate as this bill stands, to review any act of a subordinate in charge?

Mr. SWEET. Certainly, under rules and regulations.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It is true that under this law he might make an order that for infractions of the rule a certain person should pass upon him. But suppose he did not do it? I think this law should safeguard his interest and say that he has the right to have the director or the Secretary of the Treasury to pass upon that.

Mr. SWEET. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the committee went over this very carefully, and a number of the members expressed themselves just as the gentleman has expressed himself in a way, but after we had gone over it thoroughly we all came to the conclusion that the safe way was to leave it in the hands of the director, who would prescribe the rules and regulations that should govern the discipline in the hospital. I think, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana, that that is fully taken care of in the bill, and I believe he will come to that conclusion upon reflection.

Mr. HILL. This provision practically creates a petty court, which is about the same thing as a summary court-martial, absolutely necessary for local discipline, and it has somewhat the same provision in limiting the forfeiture to a certain proportion of the man's pay. Now, there is the same right in Congress to provide a forfeiture as a penalty as there is for Congress to provide articles of war for the forfeiture of a soldier's pay, and therefore this would seem to be a perfectly legal and proper thing, and an absolutely necessary thing in order to maintain discipline in the hospitals. It would seem, in accordance with all the general legal rulings on such matters, that this being practically a disciplinary court the power that appoints the court necessarily has the power of review, and that the director would have some one in his office who would review these cases as a division commander or a corps commander has to review all summary court-martial cases in the Army. So there can be no injustice created, and there is always the right of appeal. It is absolutely necessary in order to keep discipline in these hospitals.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. There would be this difference: Any appeal a man in the military service would make to the War Department or Congress would have to go through military channels, but in this case a man could appeal to his Congressman or to the director of the bureau or to the Treasury Department, either one. I think the probability of an injustice such as contemplated by the gentleman is remote.

Mr. HILL. I agree with the gentleman entirely on that. It is a much wider power of appeal than exists in the summary

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As I understand it, this provision was put in the bill because of the desire of the great body of soldiers who were in the hospitals. They wanted discipline, and the penalties can not go beyond depriving the patient of a certain proportion of his compensation.

Mr. HILL. For three months; that is all.

Mr. SWEET. And only a certain portion of that. And, so far as the right to appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury is concerned, I think section 2 of the bill gives such general powers to the Secretary of the Treasury that, if there should be grave injustice, the Secretary of the Treasury could change any ruling that had been made by any subordinate or by the director, for that matter

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It is my contention that if the boy is drawing $100 per month that $75 a month for three months should not be taken away from him on the say-so of some little petty officer down there at the hospital or school. In other words, the pay ought not to stop at that time. The director or the Secretary of the Treasury should pass on it before it was stopped, because you might seriously inconvenience or handicap a soldier when he was entirely without fault if they did not do so.

Mr. SWEET. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that there is no question but that the director under the general power that is granted him in this act can change his rules and can go over all these cases.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. But originally who has to pass on the violation?

Mr. SWEET. As provided in the rules and regulations? Mr. BLAND of Indiana. You necessarily presume that the hospital authority will do so unless you prescribe otherwise.

Mr. SWEET. I presume that under the rules and regulations perfected by the director he will probably designate some one, either in his office or in some hospital, or wherever it may be necessary, to pass upon these matters. In other words, this whole question is left within the discretion of the director, and I think it is a safe place to leave it.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. SWEET. I will.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to make two inquiries, if the gentleman will permit, about section 4 of the bill. In the first place, section 4 provides in substance that all personnel of the three existing agencies should be and "are hereby transferred to and made a part of the veterans' bureau." I had hoped that one result of the passage of this bill, or the bringing into one agency the three agencies which are now in existence, would be to make possible a very material reduction of the personnel. And yet this provision seems to imply that all personnel is to be and must be transferred. Is that the intention of the gentleman, and if it is the intention, does the gentleman assume that thereafter there will be an immediate scaling down?

Mr. SWEET. That matter will be wholly within the power of the director. Of course, at the present time in order to make the proper transfer you have got to transfer all the personnel, facilities, and property. You can not say that this fellow is transferred or that fellow is transferred. It was necessary to transfer the whole personnel of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. As to the question of cutting down the personnel, that is a matter to be taken care of afterwards.

Mr. ROGERS. I frankly was afraid if the transfer was once made it would then, because of the civil-service laws, and so forth, be very difficult for the director of the new bureau to make the reduction, and it seems to me you could meet that condition by eliminating the requirement that all the personnel should be transferred. Of course, you can not legislate in this bill who shall be taken and who shall be left, but you can say that only the personnel which, in the discretion of the director, is necessary for the new bureau shall be transferred.

That, in other words, is my suggestion as to the change in this section 4

Mr. SWEET. Yes; but that is not a matter to be put into the law. That is a matter of administration when the time comes. I do not think he will have any trouble in getting rid of the personnel if he so desires.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know. This language, as it stands, requires that all the personnel shall be transferred. It seems to me that in line with the very generous measure of authority that is given to the director of the bureau throughout the hill you may here also give him a degree of elasticity and permit him to transfer such part of the personnel as he finds the new work which he would undertake would require.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I was going to suggest, if the gentleman will permit-

Mr. SWEET. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That this same act gives the veterans' bureau all the authority and power that the other Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. bureaus now have, so that when we transfer the power we transfer the power of all those other bureaus, and specifically in this section we give the authority to the director, subject to such change of designation and organization as he may deem necessary in carrying out the provisions of this act. We abolish the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, so that if we do not transfer the personnel they would be out of the service. If we transfer them, there is nothing to prevent the director, on the first day of coming into office, from letting out a thousand employees

Mr. SWEET. Yes. In that connection I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Rogens] that in the latter part of section 1 he will find that while it does not answer his question directly, yet it says

There shall be included on the technical and administrative staff of the director such staff officers, experts, and assistants as the director shall prescribe.

So that the director has the whole question for determination and everything pertaining to the organization of the bureau in his power, and if he sees fit to discharge them all, he can do so.

Mr. ROGERS. My question was asked in connection with the idea to bring out the view of the committee, that there is no vested right in the jobs among the 7,000 men, women, and children who are engaged on this work

Mr. SWEET. No. There is no intention of legislating a man into a job.

Mr. ROGERS. In section 4 there is a reference to an order signed by the Secretary of the Treasury on April 19, 1921, quoting the designation of that order. That same reference is found in section 5.

Mr. SWEET. Yes. Mr. ROGERS. It seems to me a rather unusual procedure to incorporate, by reference in an act of Congress, a mere order of

Mr. SWEET. I may say right there, so that the gentleman will get the right view of it, that we are transferring property, and as to just what property is transferred is a difficult matter of description; but this order had been issued by the Treasury Department making the transfer of this property, so that the gentleman, if he will read the section carefully, will see that it is really a description of the property transferred. We are not incorporating an order into law, but we are merely referring to the terms of that order as descriptive of the property.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman will permit, suppose that 10 years from now a person is reading this act and passing upon its provisions and he finds a reference to an order of the Secretary of the Treasury of such and such a date. That order was probably a public order but not of a documentary or permanent character, such as he would find in a law library.

Mr. SWEET. Oh, it can be found anywhere. It is a Treasury decision, and all Treasury decisions are published and bound.

Mr. ROGERS. But it does not have the sanction of Congress as an act

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. ROGERS. Would it not be possible for the gentleman to incorporate in his remarks the exact text of that order?

Mr. SWEET. Yes. I have the order right here. Mr. ROGERS. It seems to me that would give the order a little additional solemnity and no more than it needs.

Mr. SWEET. I shall be glad to publish that as a part of my

The Treasury Department order is as follows:

Order relative to the transfer of certain activities of the United States Public Health Service relating to beneficiaries of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, including trainees of the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, Washington, April 19, 1921.

To the Surgeon General and medical officers of the United States Public Health Service, Director of Burcau of War Risk Insurance, and others concerned:

1. All of the activities of the United States Public Health Service, with the exception of such hospitals and dispensaries as are operated by that service, in so far as they affect the beneficiaries of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, including trainees under the Rehabilitation of the United States Public Health Service, with the exception of such hospitals and dispensaries as are operated to the Rehabilitation of the Rehabilitation of tion Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, are hereby transferred to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby directed to assume and administer such activities and shall hereafter be responsible for the examination, hospitalization, and proper and satisfactory medical care and treatment, including supplies, for the said beneficiaries.

2. Personnel: (a) Such regular and reserve commissioned officers of the United States Public Health Service concerned in or with the activities to be assumed and administered by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance are hereby detailed and assigned for duty to and shall be under the direction and subject to the orders of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. Such officers shall be immediately notified of such detail by the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service. As soon as practicable the regular commissioned officers will be released from duty with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. In the event that the services of any reserve commissioned officer shall become unnecessary the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service shall be so advised.

(b) All personnel of the United States Public Health Service other than that mentioned in paragraph (a) who are employed in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and who are engaged in the activities to be assumed by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance are hereby transferred to and shall be carried in the rolls of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

3. All papers, records, files, documents, and correspondence of the United States Public Health Service portaining to the activities to be assumed by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, together with all facilities, including vehicles and other equipment, now on hand and in use by the United States Public Health Service for the administration and execution of such activities, shall be delivered into the custody of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

4. The offices and buildings now occup

A. W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa one question in regard to section 1, where it says the director shall have power to appoint these experts, and so forth. I want to know whether or not you expect that he shall have the power to fix the salaries of these people that he appoints?

Mr. SWEET. In a general way I think he will have the power to fix the salaries, yet it will be with such restrictions as have been placed in the appropriation bills passed by Con-We make reference to that in another section. gentleman from Illinois is probably aware of the fact that in regard to the War Risk Insurance Bureau the Committee on Appropriations has made provision for so many men at $2,000, so many men at $1,800, and so forth. Now, the provisions in the appropriation bills are applicable to the new bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Does the gentleman desire to proceed

Mr. SWEET. Yes; I would like to proceed for two minutes. Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have the gentleman's attention to page 3, line 17, where it is proposed to transfer the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education. There are two activities under the Federal board in this rehabilitation. One is rehabilitation of disabled soldiers and the other is the rehabilitation of the industrial cripple. The industrial cripple is rehabilitated in cooperation with the various State compensation commissions. That ought to remain with the Federal board, and I think the gentleman would want the rehabilitation only of the disabled soldiers. It could easily be corrected by the insertion of the words "of the disabled soldiers" after the word "rehabilitation," making it "the rehabilitation of the disabled soldiers' division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education." That puts this rehabilitation of the soldier into this veterans' bureau, but not the disabled industrial cripple.

Mr. SWEET. That which we propose to transfer by this act was defined in the act of June 27, 1918, and the amendments thereto. That was the gentleman's own bill, as I recol-

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. And that was spoken of as the rehabilitation act, so that that which we propose to transfer refers to the act which the gentleman introduced and which passed the Congress and was approved June 27, 1918.

Mr. FESS. I understand that the gentleman does not mean to place in the veterans' bureau the rehabilitation of the indus-

Mr. SWEET. We do not; and we are not doing it here, as I understand it.

Mr. FESS. I think you are.

Mr. SWEET. I shall be glad to confer with the gentleman from Ohio, who is very familiar with this subject, and if any amendment is necessary I will agree to it, because the intention of your committee is simply to take over the rehabilitation in so far as it affects soldiers, sailors, and marines

Mr. FESS. That is right. Now, will the gentleman answer a question for information?

Mr. SWEET. Certainly. Mr. FESS. I notice that this bill amends the war risk insurance act in several items.

Mr. SWEET. Yes; that is true.

Mr. FESS. Have you amended the rehabilitation act anywhere?

Mr. SWEET. No; we have not, except in so far as reference is made in this bill, including in this consolidation the rehabilitation of soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Mr. FESS. That rehabilitation does not extend to the American boys who enlisted in the Canadian Army and then afterwards were discharged, of course, as soldiers in Canada? They are not eligible to training under the rehabilitation act?

Mr. SWEET. No; that is true.

You have not included them? Mr. FESS.

Mr. SWEET. No; we have not. I realize that situation.

Mr. FESS. They ought to be included. Mr. SWEET, Under the reciprocal provisions of the war risk insurance act, of course, a man who fought in the Canadian Army would be entitled to the benefits of the war risk insurance

Mr. FESS. Yes; and he ought to be entitled to training,

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. In that connection I will ask the gentleman what records are kept by the Board of Vocational Education on the individual who receives the training?

Mr. SWEET. Does the gentleman mean to refer to section 4? Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Section 4. What, at the present time, is the record?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has been fixed by the House and is under the control of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Winslow] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY

Mr. SWEET. I have no more time. I would be glad to answer if I had more time. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 4803) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. Poindexter, Mr. Hale, and Mr. Swanson as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

VETERANS' BUREAU.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Johnson], a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi Johnson] is recognized for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the bill before the House for consideration seeks to provide adequate relief for the ex-service men and amends in many respects legislation enacted by Congress shortly after the war between Germany and the United States began.

Congress very wisely provided insurance for the soldiers of the United States. Experience with the soldiers of former wars suggested the wisdom of life insurance written by the United States Government. The old pension system was, for reasons I know not, for many years almost a national scandal.

When this Government passed the selective draft law it did not ask the soldiers if they wanted to go to war; it did not ask them if they preferred to leave their happy homes and families to go into distant countries among strangers, fighting for freedom and civilization; it did not ask them if they would be content to leave their property and business behind. The Gov-ernment said: "You must go and risk your lives fighting to save this country."

They went. The result of their going is known to every country in the world. Many of them never returned. Many will never return. The mangled forms of many of the soldiers have been brought back to this country and now sleep in the bosom of their motherland.

These boys left dependents, left loved ones to be cared for. Many other soldiers returned broken in health; many returned maimed and wounded. They must be cared for. When they entered the war we promised them we would care for their dependents. We urged them to take no thought of the care and support of their families, for they were told by this Government that their loved ones would be cared for. We established the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for the purpose of insuring the lives of the soldiers for the benefit of those dependent upon them. We established the Federal Board for Vocational Training for disabled soldiers. The name of the board clearly indicates the purpose for which it was established. We created the Rehabilitation Division of the United States Public Health Service for the benefit of disabled sol-This Government has through these agencies undertaken to administer to the needs of the soldiers. has been charged by people all over the United States that the administration has not been efficient, that soldiers have suffered because of the inefficiency; that there has been too much 'red tape" and too much shifting of responsibility to others; that it has taken too long to obtain results. In the meantime the soldier who made application for compensation or training has been the one to suffer.

Congress has always been ready to respond to the appeal of the soldiers, and it has been made known to Congress that these conditions about which I have spoken do exist; and, therefore, Congress by this bill is seeking to correct the conditions, to centralize the authority in one man, to clothe him with full power to make regulations, appoint subordinate officers, and to give him wide latitude in the administration of this act, charging him with responsibility for the intelligent administration of the provisions of the act.

I call your attention to some of the most salient features of the bill:

It is proposed by this bill to merge the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the Federal Board for Vocational Training, and the Rehabilitation Division of the Public Health Service into one bureau, to be known as the veterans' bureau.

The compensation of the director will be $10,000 yearly. The director is authorized to establish a central office in the District of Columbia and not more than 14 regional offices and such suboffices, not exceeding 50 in number, within the territory of the United States and its outlying possessions as may be deemed necessary by him.

Such regional offices are given powers for hearing complaints, examining, rating, and awarding compensation claims, granting medical, surgical, dental, and hospital care, convalescent care, and necessary and reasonable aftercare, making insurance awards, granting vocational training, and all other matters delegated to them by the director as could be performed lawfully under this act by the central office.

All moneys heretofore appropriated for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the Federal Board for Vocational Training, and the Rehabilitation Division of the Public Health Service are made available for the veterans' bureau.

This bill makes the director responsible for the proper examination, medical care, hospitalization, necessary and reasonable aftercare, rehabilitation, and vocational training of the ex-service men, and it gives to him authority to utilize the now existing or future facilities of the Public Health Service, War Department, Navy Department, Interior Department, and National Home for Disabled Soldiers, and such other governmental facilities and services as may be available. Such governmental agencies are authorized and directed to furnish such facilities, including personnel, equipment, medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies as the director considers necessary. The director is required to standardize the character of the examination for hospitalization, vocational training, and so forth, and to maintain an inspection service with authority to examine all facilities and services utilized in the administration of the veterans' bureau.

In event the director is of the opinion that the facilities for hospitalization and medical care are insufficient he is required to make arrangements for further hospitalization, care, and treatment of the soldiers. The director is authorized to contract with State, municipal, or private hospitals for such medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies as he may deem necessary

Full authority is given the director to detail from time to time clerks or persons employed in the veterans' bureau to make examination into the merits of compensation and insurance claims. He is given authority to make such rules and regulations as he deems necessary in order to promote good conduct on the part of the soldiers who are receiving medical treatment and hospitalization.

The bill provides that the veterans' bureau shall furnish without charge therefor hospital, dental, medical, surgical, and convalescent care and treatment and prosthetic appliances for any honorably discharged officer or enlisted man, or any member of the Army Nurse Corps or of the Navy Nurse Corps, disabled by reason of wound or injuries received, or disease contracted, or by reason of any aggravation of a preexisting injury or disease while in the service of the United States on or after April 6, 1917, and in line of duty, not caused by willful misconduct. Applications for such treatment shall be made within one year from date this act goes into effect.

The director is given full authority to investigate the case of any soldier and increase or diminish the award as the facts in the case may justify. The bureau may at any time upon its own application review an award and may diminish or increase the compensation previously awarded in proportion to the degree of the disabilty.

The director is authorized to make provisions whereby the premiums on yearly renewal term insurance and United States Government insurance may be waived and the insurance deemed not to lapse in the case of those who are confined in a hospital under said bureau for a compensable disability during period while so confined; and those who are rated as temporarily or totally disabled by reason of disability or disease, entitling them to compensation, during the period of such disability and while so rated.

Another important feature of this bill gives to the policyholder an incontestable policy after six months from date of issue, or reinstatement, except for fraud or nonpayment of premiums.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill appears to be unusually liberal, but in our committee during consideration of legislation affecting the soldiers we have solved all doubt in favor of the exservice men.

Already this Government has spent in compensation to World War veterans up to May 1 a total of $213,155,178; for settlement of war-time-term-insurance policies, $206,830,533; for settlement of converted policies, $1,492,323; a grand total of $421,478,034, expended by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance alone. The Federal Board for Vocational Training, which had enrolled a total of 97,645 men up to May 1, had spent approximately $111,460,363, 70 per cent of which went to the soldiers as payments in addition to expenses of training. On May 14 the United States Public Health Service reported that 23,159 ex-service men were receiving treatment in hospitals.

The Congress of the United States has not refused to vote whatever was requested of them for the support and care of the sick and disabled soldiers, and if this bill is properly administered we will take care of every sick or disabled soldier in the United States. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, my limit in taking care of these disabled soldiers will be the ability of the Government to pay. We promised these boys when they were going away that we would take care of them and their loved ones; we said to them that when you return nothing will be too good for you, and while you are away we will take care of your dependents.

Now, hundreds of thousands of those boys have returned to their homes, some crippled, some blind, some deaf, some maimed, and hundreds of thousands diseased and incapacitated. When those soldiers were in the trenches and at the battle front fighting for freedom and civilization, and enduring the hardships of war, there were millions at home accumulating wealth and enjoying the comforts of home. Twenty-three thousand new millionaires were made during the war; hundreds of thousands of people accumulated wealth; but the soldier accumulated nothing but vermin upon his body in the trenches and suffered hardships and disease. He lay in the hospitals of pain. He was subjected to military discipline in France the like of which he had never seen in America.

Are these men to be compensated for saving this country? Are they entitled to any reward for saving all the wealth and the liberty of our people? Is America to forget their deeds of heroism? Will she be ungrateful to her soldiers who saved her? America may be forgetful at times, but she has never been ungrateful. The people will not stand for the soldiers to be neglected, and they do not care how much money is spent in taking care of these boys if it is judiciously spent and if the soldiers get the real benefit of the money.

Mr. Chairman, it ill becomes those who have not fought the plain at expense. On Memorial Day men and women all over America and on the battle fields of France, with loving hands and tear-stained cheeks, decorated the graves of our heroic dead. This is a very beautiful sentiment. We must never forget our dead who paid their lives to time and mortal custom for the preservation of our liberty, but it is more important that we remember the living than the dead.

Let us remember the crippled, blind, and diseased soldiers we have seen in the hospitals and on the streets. Let our memory run back to our districts and see the country boy, perhaps the only dependence of some old mother or father, sitting around his home, afflicted with tuberculosis contracted in the Army or suffering from some other disease as deadly. Who caused it? He was not the author of his own misfortune. Those higher in authority brought this about, and he should not be held responsible for it. Let the Government answer by taking care of this boy and his dependents.

With respect to war, justice can never be done until those who make the wars have to fight. I hope the time will come when the man or the men who bring about a war will suffer the penalty consequent to war. The men who have been making wars for all these centuries never go about them. They make the war; they make the peace; the poor soldier fights and dies, and in millions of cases he knows not why.

Mr. Chairman, I am very proud to be a member of the committee that reported this bill to the House. I hope it will be adopted as it has been reported. If it is written into a law and properly administered, the soldiers will have no cause to complain that this Government, for which they offered their lives, is ungrateful.

Let us do our duty by these soldiers fearlessly, regardless of criticism, to the end that we may preserve for this Government the priceless patriotism possessed by these soldiers when this country was imperiled. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi yields back the remainder of his time.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Black].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Black] is recognized for 15 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the soldiers' relief bill now under consideration, which provides for a consolidation of the bureaus and departments having to do with the relief of our ex-service men, and I take it that there is very little, if any, opposition to the bill, taken as a whole. Of course, the House may find it advisable to make some amendments to perfect the bill. I have not taken the floor at this time to discuss the particular measure under consideration, but another subject, which I think is of very great importance to the country at the present time.

The press dispatches of yesterday carried information as to the wage decision of the Railroad Labor Board which will be put into effect July 1. It is stated that the reduction will amount to an average of about 12 per cent from present levels and will amount to an annual reduction in the railway pay roll of about $400,000,000.

I can very easily see why the employees, as a rule, should be perfectly satisfied with the decision, because it will still leave them something more than $200,000,000 of the salary increase which was given them in July, 1920. I can see why the railroad owners for the most part will be satisfied with the decision, no doubt some of them even more so than they would have been if a greater reduction had been made. For with only this reduction of 12 per cent in their pay roll they can with considerable plausibility argue against any horizontal decrease in freight and passenger rates and contend for the system of treating each commodity separately, as now seems to be their disposition, and that reductions be made only in certain particular cases

The public, however, in my judgment, have reasonable cause to complain at this proposed decision of the Railroad Labor Board. It seems to me that the people had a right to expect that the entire increase of July, 1920, would be rescinded and leave as still existing the increases which were given to railroad employees during the period of Government control. The average increases in compensation to railroad employees, as stated by Director General Walker D. Hines in one of the hearings, during the period of Government control was 52 per cent. I think that most of the public are perfectly willing that the employees shall continue to receive that increase. But they also believe that, in view of the radical readjustment in prices of most commodities and in the rate of wages paid to men employed in other industries, the railroad employees have no battles and endured hardships, but who made money, to com- right to expect to retain more than the increases which were granted during the period of Government control and should be willing to relinquish all the increase which they received by reason of the decision of the Railroad Labor Board of July, 1920.

On April 1, 1921, the index figure of farm products was 58.3 per cent lower than a year ago, 48.6 per cent lower than two years ago, and 27.6 per cent lower than the average on April 1 of the past 10 years. Every thinking Member of this House knows that this present unbalanced condition between agriculture and some of these other basic industries like railroad transportation and steel can not continue without serious and lasting harm to the country. Either farm products and other raw material must rise to the level of manufactures, transportation, and wages paid in these favored industries, or the latter must come down to the level of the farmer, or they must all meet on some intermediate level. The latter thing is what will probably happen. Farm products will advance from their present low level, which in nearly all cases is below the cost of production, and these other things like railroad transportation and coal and steel which have not responded to the general decline are bound to come down to more intermediate levels.

I am not contending that railroad wages should do more than that. I am not contending that they should go back to prewar standards. To do so would work an injustice. Other things have not come down in proportion to the figures which I have cited as to the decline in farmers' products. But I do contend that the cost of living has come down much more than 12 per cent since July, 1920, and that therefore the decision of the Railroad Labor Board is unfair to the public and will not place upon the railroad employees their fair part of the burden of readjustment of prices so necessary for a return of normal prosperity. In fact, no burden at all, because their wages with the 12 per cent reduction will still buy more goods and commodities than in July, 1920, when the decision of the Railroad Labor Board was made.

Mr. TINCHER rose.

Mr. BLACK. If my friend will forbear with me until I have finished my statement, then I will be glad to yield for any question and will answer it if I can.

Just a few days ago I phoned the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor and asked for information as to what had been the decline in the cost of living since the decision of the Railroad Labor Board in July, 1920. The reply was that the retail cost of foodstuffs had declined 30½ per cent since that time. That figures on clothing, house rent, and miscellaneous items had not yet been completed, but would be available shortly. In fact, I telephoned the same bureau to-day, and the chief said that this information would be available at the end of this week and given out to the public—probably on Saturday. I dare say that it will show that there has been a decline of at least 20 per rent in the general cost of living, including all the items used to make up the Bureau of Labor's index number. And it must be remembered that neither the railroads nor their employees have contributed anything toward bringing about this decline. Their compensation is still on the high war levels. In my judgment it is getting high time they were doing their part, and I think the general public are feeling that way about it.

Another unfair and discriminatory part of this proposed decision of the Railroad Labor Board, as reported in the press, to which I most emphatically object, is that the reduction is made to fall more heavily on the unskilled labor than on the skilled. For instance, the press dispatches say that the reduction for section men is 18 per cent, and shop crafts 9 per cent, while the train-service men, that is to say, the higher-paid employees, are cut approximately 7 per cent.

I am not complaining that the wages of the unskilled labor is reduced in this proposed decision to a greater amount than is justified by present conditions, because, indeed, I think that part of the decision is reasonable enough in view of the figures as to the cost of living which I have just cited. What I am contending, though, is that the higher-paid employees should have been reduced in the same proportion and if they had been the total amount of the reduction would be in the neighborhood of $600,000,000 instead of $400,000,000, as it is announced it will be. In other words, should practically eliminate increases granted in July, 1920. With a reduction of that kind, and other economies which the railroads can and should be compelled to make, I think the Interstate Commerce Commission would be perfectly justified in ordering without delay a horizontal decrease of at least 15 per cent in rates and then make thereafter such other adjustments in particular commodity rates as might be just and proper in particular cases. Anything less than a 15 per cent reduction in rates will afford the public no substantial relief. It is quite evident that there is going to be a strenuous effort on the part of some of the leading railroad executives to resist any horizontal lowering of rates. In this attitude, I think they are making a serious mistake from more than one standpoint. I am no railroad baiter. I have always tried to be fair to the railroads just as I have always tried to be fair to all other legitimate interests, and as one who still wants to be fair I make this statement:

The railroad executives had better be spending their time and energies in an effort to bring about economies in operation which will make possible a substantial horizontal decrease in rates, rather than in using their efforts to resist such decrease. The public are not expecting that rates go back to prewar levels, any more than they are expecting wages to go back to prewar levels, for they know that the same reasons which would make unfair the one will make unfair the other. But they are expecting that rates shall reach a more intermediate level than they are at present, just as they expect railroad wages to reach a more intermediate level. They have a right to expect that much, and they are not going to be satisfied with anything less. They ought not to be.

As a Member of Congress seeking to represent the general public, I am not going to cease my efforts until the people get this measure of relief to which they are justly entitled. [Applause.]

Now I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. TINCHER. I should like to get the gentleman's opinion, from his examination of this subject, whether it is sound for this Government to maintain a Railroad Labor Board to fix wages and the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates?

Mr. BLACK. My answer to that is that I think events are demonstrating that undoubtedly there ought to be some coordination between the two bodies, because it is absolutely essential to good administration that the tribunal that has the responsibility of providing the finances ought to have some say-so as to the expenditure, and therein seems to be the difficulty in the present situation. I think we must have some tribunal to deal with the labor question, and perhaps a board like the Labor Board is the best way, but I believe its work will have to be coordinated in some way with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. FESS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman desire any more time?
Mr. BLACK. Yes; I will be glad to have time to answer the question of my friend from Ohio, Mr. Fess.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. FESS. I am always informed when the gentleman speaks, as is every Member of the House. I have enjoyed what he said to-day. This is the thing that distresses me: The farmers' products have to take the course of the law of supply and demand. On the other hand, the cost of operation of the railroads is partially governmental, in that rates are fixed and also wages may be fixed. How are we going ever to secure equilibrium in industry with the Government fixing the scale of cost of production in one great line while all other lines of industry of the country are outside of Government control?

Mr. BLACK. I will undertake to answer that, if the gentleman will permit, by making a statement which I feel sure he will agree with

A study of the history of public utilities will show that the rates that public utilities charge being regulated by Government commissions and Government authority always go up more slowly than commodity prices advance. That has been the universal history of public utilities so far as I know. And it is perfectly natural that the same reason should cause them to come down more slowly. I have not expected and do not now expect that railroad rates and railroad wages will be deflated as rapidly as farm products have been deflated, because it would throw the entire transportation system of the United States into utter and complete chaos if that should happen. Hard as the lot of the farmer has been during this period of falling prices, he would not want rates fixed so low as to throw the railroads into bankruptcy. My contention is that the present situation is so apparent and speaks so loudly for itself that it is perfectly absurd for any one to contend to keep transportation rates and transportation costs upon the high war level when everything else is taking substantial declines. The public must have some else is taking substantial declines. relief within a reasonable time; and if we can not get it through the proper action of the regulatory bodies which Congress has heretofore established, then Congress must do it by some new enactment of law of its own.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. HLACK. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I notice where Senator Capper stated that a farmer shipped a carload of cabbage to Chicago and they drew upon him for $58 freight. The receipts of the cabbage did not pay the freight. Has my colleague thrown out any scheme of legislation whereby we can reduce the freight rates, which are prohibitive to the shipping of commodities from Texas?

Mr. BLACK. I am trying to suggest the only scheme that I know of which will afford any relief, and that is to reduce the operating cost and then compel a reduction in rates. In 1917 the entire wage pay roll of the railroads of the United States was $1,739,000,000. Whereas in 1920 the wage pay roll was $3,800,000,000, which was within $200,000,000 of every dollar the railroads took in from every source in 1917. Of course, reduction in wages is not the only economy in operation cost which can and should be put into effect. But it is certainly one important item which can not be overlooked if the public gets any relief.

Mr. BURKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will yield to my friend from Pennsylvania. Mr. BURKE. Has the gentleman figured out what it costs to pay an entire crew on a 100-mile division for eight hours?

Mr. BLACK. No: I have not undertaken to go into those details, because I do not profess to be an expert in railroad opera-tions, but the figures I have given show that if there is any reduction in freight rates there must be a substantial reduction in the aggregate pay roll which, as I have stated, for 1920 amounted to $3,800,000,000, or within $200,000,000 of every cent the railroads took in from every source in 1917. Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggest any way by which we can reduce rates without a substantial reduction of the pay roll? And if he can, I would like the information.

Mr. BURKE. The gentleman stated that the board granted a $600,000,000 increase in July, 1920. Is that true?

Mr. BLACK. It will run about $625,000,000 annually.
Mr. BURKE. How much increase of freight rates did the Interstate Commerce Commission grant the railroads for the

Mr. BLACK. It was different for the different groups, but the total amount of the increased rates in dollars amounted to more than $1,000,000,000 per annum, and let me call this fact to the gentleman's attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas five minutes more.

Mr. BLACK. I want to answer the gentleman's inquiry, because I anticipated he would ask the question. When the Government turned the railroads back to their owners it was after an aggregate loss in the operation of them of $1,200,000,000, according to the recent statement of Director General Davis, Therefore we had an average monthly loss in operation of $50,000,000, and therefore some provision had to be made to give the roads rates which would enable them to operate without loss, because they had no Treasury of the United States to fall back upon, as the Railroad Administration had. Therefore when the Interstate Commerce Commission came to fix the rates after the roads had been returned to their owners they not only had to provide for the increase awarded by the Railroad Labor Board but they also had to provide rates which would absorb the Government deficit.

Mr. BURKE. Is it the gentleman's intention to take from the railroads $1,000,000,000 if you take the proportional amount of wages in their decrease?

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman heard what I said, I am sure, and it was this: That if the Railroad Labor Board would rescind the entire increase of July, 1920, which aggregated more than $600,000,000 per annum, that the Interstate Commerce Comprission, in my judgment, would be justified in immediately ordering a decrease in the freight rates of 15 per cent, which would save the public more than $900,000,000 a year.

Mr. BURKE. I think I caught that, but I failed to get the fact that the gentleman wanted to reduce the billion-dollar

Mr. BLACK. It was plainly stated, and I think the gentleman understands; and if he has any other inquiry I would like to have him make it, and if I can answer it I will be glad to do so.

Mr. BURKE. I would like to ask the gentleman if he voted for the Webster amendment to the railroad bill.

Mr. BLACK. The Webster amendment was not voted upon. A substitute was offered by Mr. Anderson, of Minnesota, and I voted against his substitute. The gentleman would be justified in construing that a vote in favor of the Webster amendment.

Mr. BURKE. That was to regulate the workingmen.

Mr. BLACK. It was to prevent strikes, which, in my judgment, it is just as important to labor to have prevented as any other part of the public.

Mr. BURKE. Did the gentleman vote for the packer bill?

Mr. BLACK. I did not, and I stated very fully in a speech which I made on the floor of the House why I was not going to vote for it. The gentleman does not find me side-stepping a vote on any public question. I am ready to take my responsibility any time and give an account to my constituents.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to suggest to the gentleman that a reduction of 15 per cent in freight rates might permit the railroads to carry more freight and thus increase the business, and it would not necessarily mean a decrease in the yield to the railroads.

Mr. BLACK. I think the gentleman is exactly correct about that and such situation should be fully considered by the Interstate Commerce Commission in determining what horizontal decrease in rates is proper and possible.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BLACK. Certainly.
Mr. MEAD. In order to bring out more strikingly the suggestion that this decrease in freight rates is necessary and is warranted, I would like to say that the railroads—and I think investigation will bring out the point—had their pay rolls padded during the time the Government controlled the railroads. I can safely say that in the terminal near my home they had an unwarranted number of supervising officials drawing large salaries who have since been dismissed from the service, dismissed the day that the railroads went under private control. In addition, the railroad companies have started a propaganda to abrogate the full crew. In Pennsylvania alone I understand they will dismiss some 2,000 employees absolutely needed for the safety of the traveling public.

Mr. BLACK. It is all right for the gentleman to make the statement and I have no objection to his making it, but I do not think his statement relates to the subject that I was undertaking to discuss, to wit, the looking upon the freight rate situation as a whole and the urgent necessity of bringing about such economy as will not only justify but make it obligatory on the Interstate Commerce Commission to give the public the relief to which it is entitled. As to the charges the gentleman from New York makes I do not profess to have any personal knowledge about it, and, therefore, I would say neither yea nor nay as to what the gentleman said. I suggest that the gentleman might well place those facts before the Interstate Commerce Commission to be considered by it in settling with the railroads, [Applause.]
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the bill that has been reported and is now before the committee is really in response to considerable agitation. Last year general charges were made against the rehabilitation work of the Federal board which reached the situation finally in the House where an investigation of the work of the Federal board was ordered by resolution of the House. That investigation was conducted, as Members will recall, by the Committee on Education. The report of the investigation was brief, but the hearings were very voluminous, covering some thousand pages. Before the committee came many interested people, including members of the disabled group from various districts where the rehabilitation work was being carried on. We found that these complaints were almost entirely confined to delay and confusion growing out of three departments operating independently. For example, if a man wanted to take advantage of the rehabilitation act under the old law, he must have been discharged with his compensation fixed by the War Risk Insurance Bureau, dependent upon his disability. Therefore we could not determine the eligible men until they had received their rating for compensation. The War Risk Insurance Bureau got so congested and so far behind with its work that it caused a great number of applicants to wait, and wait interminably, to get a decision from the board whether they could be trained or not. This protracted delay was the source of great dissatisfaction among the disabled men. Then there was another very unfortunate feature. When the man would go before the public-health officer to ascertain his condition under proper medical examination, he had to go to still another bureau. It was not infrequent that these functions of the Government would be located in different parts of the city where the examination was being carried on. The formality of waiting turn from office to office was troublesome. We found that there was some foundation for this great distress upon the part of the applicant. One of the first things that was done to remedy the situation was to place the office of the public health in the some building with the Rehabilitation Division of the Vocational Board.

That, of course, could not be done with the War Risk Insurance Bureau, because that operated from this point at Washington which was without these regional districts such as the Vocational Board had and such as are provided in this bill. We then finally passed through the House and the Senate an amendatory act, which permitted the Vocational Board to give final judgment without waiting for the decision of the War Insurance Bureau. That remedied the situation largely as to rehabilitation but not as to compensation. Still we could not concentrate responsibility for this work. The Committee on Education after going over all of the facts made several recommendations to Congress, and one of the recommendations was to centralize this work by placing the rehabilitation work under the same department with the War Risk Insurance Bureau and the Public Health Bureau. The War Risk Insurance Bureau was under the Treasury Department and the Public Health was under the Treasury Department, while the Vocational Rehabilitation was under an independent board. It was partly education, and education was under the Interior Department. The committee did not specify in its recommendations to place it under the Department of the Treasury, nor under the Department of the Interior, but recommended that these three be concentrated and placed under one department. So much for the necessity of centralization of authority. When the Hughes Commission made its investigation of the work of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the Members here will recall that the recommendation was to decentralize the administration of that work-it was all done here at Washington-so that in various districts final decisions could be rendered without having to bring them all here, where the work was months behind.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. In the investigation which the gentleman conducted into the operation of the Federal rehabilitation act, the gentleman discovered, I am sure, just what effect the decentralization had had in that bureau; that is, decentralizing it so as to establish its operation in the hands of local agencies subordinate to the central body in Washington. I wish the gentleman would tell the committee just what success they had as compared with their previous experience, both as to expedition and the satisfactory character of these adjustments.

Mr. FESS. In the expedition of decision we saved an immense amount of lost motion. We got the decision quickly and without any inconvenience to the applicant. I can truthfully say that the decentralization into the 14 districts with the various suboffices under the 14 districts simply did wonders in removing complaint that was theretofore quite general.

Mr. BRIGGS. I was informed by a member of the vocational board that these regional agencies were able to act on a man's claim in 24 to 48 hours after he had his discharge; that the application was made there to the authorities in the Federal vocational board and he was sent up to the next floor to be examined by the medical officers, and they were able to act on his claim at once without referring it to Washington unless there was some data to be obtained from The Adjutant General's Office if he did not have his discharge.

Mr. FESS. In a general way the gentleman's information is correct. I do not know about the 24 hours, but it is true that the saving of time in transmitting the evidence from a distant point to Washington, to be probably confused with many others, created such a delay that when it could be done at the point of examination it saved the time greatly, as anyone could see, and most of the former complaints were discontinued.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I did not hear the gentleman answer this exact question. Does the gentleman know what the practice of the Federal board has been in respect to keeping at the local office the jacket in the case of a particular applicant for vocational training?

Mr. FESS. I understand it is kept at the local office up to at least the time the trainee is discharged.

Mr. ROGERS. So that unless there is an appeal or some peculiar conditions the papers in a man's case never go to Washington at all.

Mr. FESS. I so understand it. Mr. ROGERS. Does not the gentleman think that possibly the enormous improvement which we have all noted with gratification in the handling of problems by the Federal board is very largely due to that one circumstance?

Mr. FESS. I certainly think that is true.

Mr. FESS.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the same analogy will be applied to the new bureau.

Mr. FESS. That is really why I asked for time. seemed to be some objection to the provision for decentralizing this work into the 14 regional districts. That is the chief virtue of this legislation. It seems to me that is the meat in the coconut. It is the one thing that removed the various complaints of the rehabilitation work.

As to section 6 I am thoroughly in accord with the desire of the committee if we can reduce the 140 suboffices now in operation in the rehabilitation work to 50, but I frankly state to you that I am fearful of the effect of that. I want to make sure that the dropping of 100 offices will not harm the work. I am thinking of Ohio, for example. We have one of these suboffices in Cleveland, a city of three-quarters of a million people, and there are a number of persons in that city who are beneficiaries of that work. Then there is another office at Cincinnati, at the other diagonal point of the State. There is another office at Toledo, and one in the central portion of the State at Columbus, and then one at Dayton.

The Dayton office is only about 65 or 70 miles from Columbus. and about 65 from the Cincinnati office. I do not believe, as I now see it, that it would be quite safe to go upon a basis that we could reduce these five offices to one or two. Frankly, I am perfectly willing to do it if it can be done safely. I may be mistaken in this matter. I do not have the same fear the gentle-man from Illinois [Mr. McKenzie] had when he said that if you transferred all of this personnel over under a new department you have retained these persons permanently in office. have not that fear. I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] explained that fully, that it does not perpetuate the personnel. We have the power to reduce it to any degree at any time. I do not think that is to be feared, but I do want to know whether the work of a State like Ohio, that is done in five suboffices, can safely be done in one or two at the present time. That I hope will be looked at very carefully before the bill becomes a law.

Mr. NORTON. The fact is that I was informed within the last month that where it took a fellow two or three weeks they will guarantee that an ordinary person can get through in

Mr. FESS. It is expeditious, of course. I want to call atten-on also to this item on page 3. My friend, the chairman of the tion also to this item on page 3. subdivision of the committee, thinks the words in line 17, habilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education," applies only to the disabled soldiers act. I think that he is mistaken there, but, on the other hand, I think it is broad enough to take in rehabilitation of the industrial cripples, which is a separate bill, and, while it is not an amendment to this bill, yet it is called a rehabilitation act.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman refer to the Federal Employees' Compensation Commission?

Mr. FESS. Yes. It will not do to mix the two, nor does the committee want to do that. The rehabilitation of the disabled soldier is really a Federal function, while the rehabilitation of industrial cripples is a cooperative function between the Federal Government and the States. That is being done in cooperation with the State compensation commissions, and we should not mix them up in that way.

Mr. SWEET. The act to which the gentleman refers is not an amendment, but is what is known as the rehabilitation act. It is a separate act. Now the truth is that which we transfer here is simply what is known as the Rehabilitation Division of the Vocational Education, and we refer to it by date, June 27, 1918, so it seems to me that the present provision expresses just what we intend. Of course, there is no intention on the part of the committee to include that other act.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman thinks that is identified sufficiently?

Mr. SWEET. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. May I have one minute?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. FESS. The Committee on Education has before it now a bill called the public-welfare bill. The Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate has the same bill, which proposes to establish a new department with four subdivisions, and one of those subdivisions is this veterans' administration. This bill now before us fixes the veterans' service administration under the Treasury Department. If the public welfare bill goes through, it will transfer this when it becomes a law to the public welfare division, consequently this measure is not in opposition, and I am for this bill, although this is not the same as the other bill I have introduced.

Mr. CANNON. I am for it for another reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, while we were discussing transportation a few moments ago it occurred to me it would be proper at this time to bring up a question bearing directly on the transportation problem of the country. I am speaking of the report that will in the near future be submitted to the Congress by the International Joint Commission, as I understand that report will come during the life of the present Congress. The International Joint Commission, as you know, was authorized by the last Congress to investigate the practicability of the construction of a ship canal connecting the Great Lakes with the Atlantic Ocean by way of the St. Lawrence River. I shall oppose it, because I am not in favor of building a canal, by using the public moneys, which when built will serve no necessary purpose. Ninetenths of this improvement will be in the Dominion of Canada and will tend to build up that country's ports to the detriment of our own. I am opposed to it because it will take, as I understand it from an unofficial report, approximately $1,400,000,000 to construct this ship canal, and in addition to that it will cost upward of $12,000,000 per foot to deepen the existing channels and canals of the Great Lakes, and it will then cost about $500,000 a year to maintain each additional foot of depth which must be maintained in order that ocean vessels be allowed to navigate the Lakes. So that altogether this so-called ship canal will require a huge expenditure of public money.

Now, then, in view of the fact that every river and harbor in the United States along the Atlantic coast and along the Gulf coast and Pacific coast, as well as the harbors on the Great Lakes, are in need of improvement, and these improvements have already been approved, and because of the present and necessary desire of economy, I think the use of the public moneys ought to be directed to the improvement of our own existing rivers, canals, and harbors, and not for the construction of a canal in a foreign country. The United States Board of Engineers reported to Congress that upward of $78,000,000 is needed now to carry forward projects partially completed and others already approved. Next year a still greater demand will be made for river and harbor improvement. At a recent session of the River and Harbor Congress it was stated by the representatives of the Mississippi Valley that a billion dollars would be required to carry on river and harbor improvement wholly within the country. The elaborate annual report of the Chief of Engineers will show where such appropriations are needed. There is hardly a river or a port from Maine to Florida, along the Gulf, along the Great Lakes, or on our western coast but that needs Federal appropriations to complete projects already approved, and some of them have already been started and should be completed.

My friends, if we decide to approve the report of the International Joint Commission, and if this canal is finally constructed, there is a question in my mind as to whether or not it will ever be used for a ship canal. Personally, I do not believe it ever will. I believe it will be a competing barge canal to that barge canal built already in New York and built by American money.

In one of the reports of the Board of Engineers we find the following:

If a ship canal were built, the business thereon would not be done in large lake or ocean vessels, but in barges and boats, which could be equally well accommodated in a canal of much less size.

The Roosevelt commission of 1900, headed by Gen. Francis V. Greene, made a thorough investigation of the subject of a ship canal between the Great Lakes and the ocean, and in its report stated:

"There are certain insuperable difficulties in the way of such a canal ever being a success, no matter by whom constructed. It is intended to be used by vessels which can navigate the ocean, the canal, and the Lakes. We do not believe that such vessels can be constructed so as to be economically a commercial success. The ocean vessel is built to withstand the fierce storms of the Atlantic and costs in its most modern type about $71 per ton of carrying capacity. The vessel that can navigate the Lakes is built to withstand less frequent and dangerous storms; it has less draft on account of the smaller depth of the harbors on the Lakes, and is built much less substantially; its cost is about $36 per ton of carrying capacity. The cost of a canal fleet, consisting of a steamer and three consorts, with a total capacity of 3,900 tons, according to figures furnished us by boat builders, will be $28,500, or $7.31 per ton."

This shows that the vessel that is a success upon the ocean will never be made a commercial success upon the Lakes or upon the canals connecting the Lakes with each other and with the ocean.

Another objection to the construction of this ship canal is that after we get it built with America's money it can be used only a part of the year. Navigation is closed in that far-distant northland about six months of the year, according to the severity of the season. It is a very dangerous river to navigate; on account of the ice and tempestuous weather and fogs no insurance can be given to any boat after the 1st of November until the summer again comes around.

I could read a long list of major disasters that occurred in the Atlantic just outside of the gulf, but in the river itself. In 1914 the Canadian Pacific liner Empress of Ireland was in collision with the collier Storstad in the St. Lawrence River and sank in 20 minutes, and unward of 1,000 lives were lost. That is just one of a great number of major disasters that occurred in the St. Lawrence River, and furnishes evidence of the dangers of navigation there. Capt. Kendall, captain of one of these vessels, said, when the disaster was investigated, that it was very foggy, and although the officers of both vessels saw each other approaching, the fog settled down so suddenly that they were lost to each other's view and the collision occurred.

The St. Lawrence, as the result of many other disasters, has become known as the "graveyard of the Atlantic." You will remember the Titanic disaster. That occurred just outside of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, where those great fields of icebergs make navigation dangerous. It is in the direct line of all vessels making from European ports to the mouth of the St. Lawrence. And therefore, as a result of the dangers incident to its navigation, and because of the river being closed for a great part of the year, I feel those are additional reasons why America's money should not be expended in such an enterprise.

Another objection to it is that it is wholly within Canadian territory, except about one-tenth of its distance. The only way that could be overcome would be by ceding to the United States Government at least one shore line of this river, such as was done in the building of several European canals, or in the ceding of one-half the Canal Zone, as was done in the case of the Panama Canal. Some arrangement should be made by international agreements along these lines before we seriously consider the proposition. One of the arguments presented by those in favor of the canal is that the needs of commerce warrant its construction. But, my friends, I understand from the reports, which I will submit later, from the Department of Commerce and the War Department that less than 10,000,000 tons of Great Lake tonnage reaches the seaboard each year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. MEAD. I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. MEAD. I have a telegram here from the New York State engineer who has supervision over the New York Barge Canal, recently completed, in which he informs me that the maximum carrying capacity of the new barge canal under normal conditions will be 20,000,000 tons, or twice the tonnage that reaches the seaboard of the Great Lakes. So the needs of commerce will be abundantly cared for by the present barge

Now, then, I believe that as the result of the construction of the great barge canal by the State of New York, which will cost the people approximately $200,000,000, and the building of 50 or more great terminals, now nearly completed, as well as the construction of State-owned elevators at Oswego and New York City, just ordered by the recent legislature, we will have there one of the finest canal systems in all the world, capable of handling twice the tonnage of the Great Lakes, and a canal which will be all-American, a canal which will tend to build up American seaports, a canal which will tend to build up this great Nation.

I am not in favor of diverting our trade and building up the ports of Montreal and Ottawa when we can invest our money and spend our time in building up such ports as Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Savannah, New Orleans, and others, as well as the ports on the Pacific coast. I believe, my friends, we shall be making a serious mistake and a bad investment by considering favorably the building of this so-called St. Lawrence ship canal. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Denison].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make some general observations in view of some of the statements that were made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. As a preface, I wanted to say that the bill now under consideration represents, of course, the unanimous views of the committee that reported it, The committee gave it very tedious and very careful consideration, and I want to say that I think the House is under a debt of gratitude to the subcommittee which conducted the hearings and labored very strenuously in the preparation of this bill. There was a great deal of work involved in it. The members of that subcommittee, as I remember it, were members of the comthe St. Lawrence River-not the Gulf of St. Lawrence, or not in mittee during the war, and they have made a study of this whole subject from the beginning of this character of legislation; and not only the full committee, but the House, is indebted to the subcommittee for the careful work which they did in connection with the consideration of this legislation.

I also want to express appreciation of the clear explanation of the bill which the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. Sweet] has given on the floor this afternoon, particularly of that part of his remarks which reviewed the entire legislation of Congress with reference to our soldiers of the World War, both during their service and since their discharge. There have been a great many complaints made, I am sure, to all of us about the treatment of the soldiers, the veterans; and sometimes it seems that those who complain are unable or else are unwilling to properly discriminate and place the blame where it belongs. They blame Congress for the faults of those who have been charged with the administration of the law. I feel that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Sweet] has made a complete and clear presentation of what Congress has done, and I am sure that Congress itself has done everything that we could do to afford every relief and every consideration that could have been given by legislation to the veterans of the war.

Now, while this bill has the unanimous approval of the committee, yet, as a matter of course, it does not represent the individual views of every member of the committee; that is, all of its provisions do not represent the individual views of all the members of the committee. It is the consensus of the views of the committee, the best that we could all agree upon.

There is one section of the bill that I want to speak about particularly, and that is the section referred to by the gentle-man from Ohio [Mr. Fess]. I refer to the provision of the bill which provides for decentralizing the activities of the veterans' bureau. I am going to support the bill. I think it is going to accomplish a great deal of good, but I am not convinced in my own mind that this decentralizing of the bureau is going to be a good thing. I think there ought to be a decentralization of certain of the activities of these various bureaus which will be combined in the veterans' bureau, but I doubt in my own mind the wisdom of decentralizing final action in the rating of disability, in the final adjustment of claims, and in the final settlement of insurance, and so forth.

I think it would be a good thing if we could have more of these suboffices referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] than is provided for in the bill; but I do not think the regional offices ought to have the final powers that are conferred upon them by this bill. For instance, I think it would be a good thing to have a greater number than 50 of these suboffices, which should have power, for example, to hear complaints and make examinations or even ratings, as far as that is concerned, and to grant medical, surgical, or dental care, or even hospital care and convalescent care, as it is called in the bill. But I am afraid it is going to be a mistake to allow so many different offices, scattered all over this country, to make final adjustments and come to final decisions on these important questions, I am afraid it is going to result in a lack of uniformity in the administration of the law. I do not care how essentially valuable a particular legislation may be, if it is not uniformly administered there is going to be endless complaint.

You will no doubt remember, when we passed the draft law and provided for local draft boards all over the United States. under the first regulations of the War Department the draft law was not administered in the same manner in hardly any two parts of the United States, and that was the main cause of complaint against the draft law. Men were treated differently by different boards. It was because of lack of uniformity in its administration. One policy was being put into effect by one draft board, and in another district—close to it, possibly—an entirely different policy was being followed by another board. Now, I am afraid that there is going to be a lack of uniformity in the final determination of these questions that will come up, because of the divided authority, and my judgment now is that it will not be very many years until Congress will amend this law and repeal this provision. We have already done that very thing with reference to the Pension Bureau.

First, there came a demand for a decentralizing of the Pension Bureau, and Congress, yielding to the demand, established pension agencies in various central cities throughout the United States and put high-salaried officers in charge of them. After-Congress repealed that law and brought those offices back into Washington, and I am afraid we are going to have the same experience in the administration of this law. The history of that legislation is quite interesting. The old soldiers themselves became dissatisfied with the delays and inefficiency of the Pension Bureau, due to divided authority, and they demanded a recentralizing of the bureau. The House passed a bill for that purpose, but it could not pass the Senate. The appointment | men entitled to relief?

of the numerous regional pension officials was senatorial patronage. And the House had to pass the bill either three or four times, I am informed, before the Senate would yield and approve it. Finally, the law was passed and the regional pension offices were abolished. History may repeat itself with the legislation now under consideration.

I believe there ought to be a decentralizing of certain parts of the administration of the veterans' bureau. It will expedite the business of the bureau and be a great help and convenience to both the veterans and the Government.

But I doubt the wisdom of dividing or decentralizing the authority to make final adjustments and decisions. I fear there will result serious delays and lack of uniformity in administering the law.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I think I understood the chairman of the subcommittee in his argument to say that all of these regional suboffices would be governed by rules and regulations inaugurated by the director, and from that I concluded that the same rules and regulations would be in force all over the country, and that each suboffice would be governed by the same rules and regulations as the others, and therefore necessarily would be bound to reach the same conclusion concerning the same subject matter.

Mr. DENISON, I am glad the gentleman from Texas mentioned that, because I was coming right to that when he interrupted me.

All of the local draft boards under the draft law were supposed to be governed by rules and regulations issued by the Judge Advocate General, but they nearly all administered the law differently. Regulations are not always what they should be. Besides, under this bill the regional offices will operate under the law and not under regulations.

But let me call the attention of the committee to this: If I understood the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Sweet] correctly, I do not think we have expressed in section 6 of the bill the proposed plan as he understands it. If you will examine section 6 carefully, you will see that it authorizes these regional offices to exercise all the powers that the central office can exercise, and they do not depend upon any direction or regulation of the director for their power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Sweet] will read that sentence in section 6 again carefully, I am sure he will agree with me that this section confers upon the regional offices all those powers which the central office possesses, and, therefore, they can do anything, without regard to any directions or regulations from the director, that the central office can do.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I was going to call the gentleman's attention to section 2 which provides that-

The director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall administer, execute, and enforce the provisions of this act, and for that purpose shall have full power and authority to make rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this act but which are necessary or appropriate to carry out its purposes and shall decide all questions arising under this act except as otherwise pro-

Now, my notion is that the regulations would govern notwithstanding the specific provision of section 6. So far as I am concerned—I can not speak for the committee—it is my understanding that the regulations of the director reach clear on down through the suboffices. If that is not the proper language, I would be quite willing to make such changes as would bring that about.

Mr. DENISON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the language right here in section 2, which he has just quoted: shall have full power and authority to make rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this act but which are necessary or appropriate to carry out its purposes, and shall decide all questions arising under this act except as otherwise provided herein.

He can not make any regulations or rules which would be inconsistent with the other provisions of the act. That is what I am talking about. One of the other provisions is in section 6, and that expressly confers the same authority on the regional offices that is conferred upon the central office.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman think that if those regional offices are only to have the privilege of making recommendations to the central office it is going to obviate the evils and difficulties now being encountered and experienced by the

Mr. DENISON. We might not be able to perform all the duties as quickly, but there are other things to be considered in a great law of this kind besides mere speed.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does not the gentleman think, if a man is suffering for his pension in order to receive proper attention in the way of food, raiment and treatment, that if he does not get it within a reasonable time he may not need it later? There have been cases within my knowledge where a man has had to wait six months to get his claim acted on. In one case the man died, but fortunately he undertook to get his insurance reinstated and did it on his own certificate, and so forth, but now his certificate is being questioned by the insurance bureau on the ground that he did not have medical examination, and that if he did it might have shown that he was not in as good health when he got it as he thought he was.

Mr. DENISON. Such delays are inexcusable, of course, and most all of us could call attention to special cases that have come within our observation. But by this bill we are trying to remedy those evils and extend the bureau's activities out into all parts of the country, so that it will be in more intimate touch with the needs of the veterans. The suboffices ought to be so numerous that they could be conveniently reached by all of the veterans, and they ought to have the power to make examinations and investigations and recommendations.

what I am thinking of-

Mr. BRIGGS. Does not the gentleman think that the regional offices can pass the allowance under certain standards prescribed by the bureau just as efficiently as the surgeons or officials can do it here in Washington?

They have to take the same written examination from the field that the regional board would have before them, and they are congested to the extent that they have recently had 60,000 cases unacted upon in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. And they could not find the papers for days and could not locate the jackets

Mr. DENISON. That is purely the fault of the administration; if they had as many officers to attend to the matter as we provide in this bill, they could have done the work promptly.

Mr. BRIGGS. They claim that is the fault of Congress, because they have not given them enough to do the business.

Mr. BARKLEY. This bill provides for the very thing the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. BRIGGS. But the gentleman from Illinois is questioning the advisability of giving these regional officers the power of Mr. BARKLEY. No; he was referring to the subofficers. He is not objecting to the regional officers.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to make a suggestion in reference to the regional officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois two

Mr. DENISON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana for a

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Although the final adjudication is now made in the city of Washington, as a matter of fact the adjudications are made by various examiners, and no one mind passes on them all; so, in creating the regional boards, permitting final adjudication by the different regional boards is a matter of geography rather than a matter of definition.

Mr. DENISON. You might say the same thing about every other Government activity. Take the Federal Reserve Board, for example. You might say that we ought to authorize all the regional reserve boards over the United States to have final authority about the Federal reserve act. You could make that same observation with reference to every governmental

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman has in mind the possibility of some confusion arising out of the lack of uniformity in administration. I think that is possible.

Mr. DENISON. Yes; that is what I had in mind. Mr. FESS. The main point is that there is such a congestion here, when it is all done at Washington, that the beneficiaries, scattered all over the United States, as in the rehabilitation work, could not be given expeditious action, and if you have a regional board somewhere near where they are located. instead of getting the cases lost over here in Washington, you would have precisely the result we had in the rehabilitation work, namely, expeditious final decisions. I admit that in the regional offices they do have these three functions of awarding compensation, making insurance awards, and granting vocational training. That is exactly what should be done at the regional office, and that is precisely what the bill means to do. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. DENISON. I know that.

Mr. FESS. And I do not believe my friend's fears are well grounded.

Mr. DENISON. I understand that is what the bill does, and I am going to support it, because I am going to yield my judgment to what I consider may be the better judgment of the subcommittee and of the other members of the committee. Then, this policy of decentralization is advocated by the legion organization, and there seems to be a general sentiment for it. It has been recommended by the Hughes Commission and by others, and I am going to support it, because whenever I find my views are out of harmony with those of so many others I think, perhaps, that I am wrong. But I merely desired to express my apprehension that by dividing the final authority in the administration of this great and important Government service among the various regional offices there may result a lack of uniformity in the treatment of the veterans and their dependents and a cumbersome, expensive, and persistent bureaucracy which will sooner or later make necessary the repeal of this feature of the legislation.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Anderson, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6611) to establish in the Treasury Department a veterans' bureau, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted— To Mr. Graham of Illinois, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. Taylor of Tennessee, for one week, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 3, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

149. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting condemnation proceedings in connection with the acquisition of land for Camp Benning, Ga. (H. Doc. No. 90); to the Committees on Appropriations and Military Affairs.

150. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, together with a report of Maj. R. Park, Corps of Engineers, on a preliminary examination of Columbia River between Chinook, Wash., and the head of Sand Island; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

151. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a tentative draft of a bill authorizing certain officers on the retired list of the Navy and Marine Corps to receive pay in accordance with their rank as now shown by the records of the Navy Department; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RESOLUTIONS ON SPEECH OF AMBASSADOR HARVEY.

Mr. DIAL. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the American Legion Post, No. 28, of Spartanburg, S. C., on the recent speech of George Harvey

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printe as requested.

The resolutions are as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION, SOUTH CAROLINA POST, NO. 28, Spartanburg, S. C.

Whereas the American ambassador to Great Britain, George Harvey, has proclaimed to the world that America entered the World War through fear and selfishness, and laggardly at that; and Whereas we feel that such an expression is a disgrace to Americanism: Therefore be it

Therefore be it

Resolved, That Spartanburg Post, No. 28, American Legion, resents individually and collectively this base slander upon American patriotism, and we condemn in unmeasured terms this un-American, unpatriotic, and callous utterance of an accredited representative of the United States. We feel that the young men of America, who through love of country and for the cause of righteousness and justice, as well as the preservation of Christian civilization, offered their all upon their country's altar, do not deserve this uncalled-for, ill-advised, and untimely utterance from one who was not in the war, and whose expression, if true, would reduce their patriotic services to base, ignoble selfishness, and cowardice.

Resolved further, That such slanderous, malign, and false statements, if unchallenged by those who bore the brunt of battle and whose spark of patriotism was kindled for a cause they thought to be right, will in the future dwarf American patriotic impulses and reflect discredit in the eyes of the world upon American manhood; be if further

Resolved, That we request an expression from our Chief Executive and from the Secretary of State as to their approval or disapproval of their accredited representative's utterance.

Resolved further, That these resolutions be forwarded to the State commander of the American Legion, with request that they be forwarded by him to the national headquarters. American Legion, for publication in the Legion Monthly, and that copies be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and George Harvey.

LESTER A. ROCKWELL.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 63) for the relief of Lester A. Rockwell, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 92) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows

By Mr. McCORMICK: A bill (S. 1953) to bring about the centralization of Government purchases, to create the bureau of supply, and for other | Board.

purposes: to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

By Mr. WILLIS: A bill (S. 1954) granting a pension to William E. Quinn (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions, By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 1955) to amend title 9, section 900, paragraph (8), of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, and for other purposes," approved February 24, 1919; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 67) stating the true meaning and intent of the provisions relating to the erection and use of the George Washington Memorial Building in the act entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improve-ment of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1913, as amended; to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMENDMENT TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL,

Mr. McCORMICK submitted an amendment to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 89, after line 17, add a new section to read as follows:

SEC. 3. Sections 17 and 18 of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, as amended by sections 17 and 18 of the act of June 4, 1920, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," are amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 17. Infantry: The Infantry shall consist of 1 chief of Infantry with the rank of major general, 4,200 officers in grades from colonel to second lieutenant, inclusive, and 110,000 enlisted men, organized into such Infantry units as the President may direct: Provided, That after January 1, 1922, there shall be in such units not less than four regiments the enlisted personnel of which shall be composed exclusively of colored men. Hereafter all tank units shall form a part of the Infantry.

"SEC. 18. Cavalry: The Cavalry shall consists of 1 chief of Cavalry with the rank of major general, 950 officers in grades from colonel to second lieutenant, inclusive, and 20,000 enlisted men, organized into Cavalry units as the President may direct: Provided, That after January 1, 1922, there shall be in such units not less than four regiments the enlisted personnel of which shall be composed exclusively of colored men."

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the deficiency appropriation bill may be proceeded with at the point reached when we suspended its consideration yesterday

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6300) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment of the committee is, on page 80, after line 5, to insert under the heading "Interdepartmental social hygiene board"

Mr. WARREN. A Senator now absent has asked that this amendment may go over for the present. So it may be temporarily passed over if there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be temporarily passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 81, after line 9, to insert: SHIPPING BOARD.

EMERGENCY SHIPPING FUND.

For additional amount required for "the expenses of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, for administrative purposes, the payment of claims arising from the cancellation of contracts, damage charges and miscellaneous adjustments, maintenance and operation of vessels, the completion of vessels now under construction, and for carrying out the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes,' approved June 5, 1920." $75,000,000: Provided, That the provision contained in the sundry civil act approved March 4, 1921, authorizing $55,000,000 to be used for the expenses of the Fleet Corporation from certain specific sources is hereby amended so as to provide that said sum may be derived from any income received by the Fleet Corporation during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President I had intended to discuss the

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I had intended to discuss this amendment possibly at some length, but I am not going to do so. I wish to take merely a few moments to call attention to the situation as to our shipping interests and some of the reasons that are making it very difficult to develop and maintain our merchant marine. I think there are two fundamental things that enter into the proposition. One is the extravagance which has taken place in the operations and the work of the Shipping

There have been, it seems to me, extravagance and a waste of the people's money that is absolutely criminal. I do not know just where the responsibility rests, but if the American people are to carry the burden of the loss in building up a merchant marine that loss must be made as small as possible. It has been variously estimated that we are losing in the operation of our merchant marine from $500,000 to $1,000,000 a day. The extravagance has had something to do with it.

The second point that troubles me is that the American people do not seem willing to support their merchant marine. Prominent Americans are traveling on British boats and shipping their goods on British boats. We have a slogan that we see with reference to our American boats, "Ship and sail under the Stars and Stripes," but when our ambassador comes back from Britain he travels on a British boat; when our ambassador goes to Britain he travels on a British boat; when American consuls go abroad, they travel on British boats. Some prominent Americans who have been connected with the Shipping Board, and who have been preaching the doctrine to the American people of standing by American ships, travel on British boats. I do not know, if the American people are not willing to give their support by shipping and sailing under the Stars and Stripes, how we are ever going to build up a merchant marine.

I believe that we have got to carry the loss. We can not give up the American merchant marine. We have started into this activity; our hand is to the plow, or, rather, the bow; we can not turn back; but the American people are going to begin to inquire about this awful extravagance, and they may demand that we give up the experiment of trying to have a merchant marine. However, if we are going to have it, let us cut down the cost, the necessary loss-and there will be a necessary loss.

I have in my hand a list of the officers and employees of the Shipping Board. I am not going particularly to charge up to the last administration the facts disclosed; but the present administration is surely not responsible for the situation as to the outrageous salaries and outrageous expenses. I hope that we shall soon have a Shipping Board that will go to the bottom of this situation and cut the salary list to the bone. The salaries which are paid to counsel and assistant counsel and to great numbers of officers of the Shipping Board make the salaries of Senators and Representatives look almost pitiful.

For instance, I refer to the law division. The general counsel of the law division receives a salary of $10,000 a year; special assistant to the general counsel receives a salary of $7,500. The acting admiralty counsel receives a salary of $6,000; the nautical adviser receives a salary of $5,000; and there is another counsel with a salary of $6,000. I started to count these officers, but the list is long. I think, however, there must be 25 or 30 assistant counsel with salaries running all the way from $6,500 per annum down to $3,000 per annum.

There are other assistant counsel in the New York offices. Then there is a long list of attorneys. It can not be that all of these offices and officers are essential to carry on the work of the Shipping Board.

There is the division of insurance, with a director of insurance at a salary of $7,200 per annum, and large numbers of assistants. There is a division of regulations, which regulates rates and practices of interstate water carriers, with an examiner in charge, with a large salary, and two assistant examiners. There is also an examiner's office under the division of insurance, with a chief pay roll examiner receiving a salary of $5,000, and a number of assistants.

There is a division of industrial relations, with a director receiving a salary of $10,000 and a number of assistants. There is also a construction claims board, with a director receiving a salary of $10,000 per annum, and three members receiving a salary of $8,500 apiece, and another member who receives a salary of $10,000.

There is a treasurer's office, with a treasurer receiving a salary of $10,000 per annum, an assistant treasurer who receives $6,000 per annum, an assistant to the treasurers with a large salary, and chief clerks and clerks and assistant clerks and subassistant clerks.

Now, listen to this: There is the comptroller's office, with a general comptroller, who receives a salary of $15,000 a year, which is twice the salary of a United States Senator. There is an assistant general comptroller, who receives a salary of $8,500 a year; a deputy general comptroller, with a salary of $10,000 a year; another deputy general comptroller who receives a salary of $10,000 a year; a special deputy comptroller $10,000 a year; another deputy general comptroller who receives a salary of $10,000 a year; a special deputy comptroller who receives $10,000 a year; a special assistant who receives $4.800; a chief accountant who receives $7,500; and a chief traveling auditor who receives $7,000. So the salaries go in the comptroller's office, aggregating the sum of nearly $100,000 a year.

Then there is a ship sales division, with a manager drawing $7,500 a year; a consulting engineer, $5,000; an insurance adviser who is paid on a per diem basis; an advertising department manager at a high salary.

Then there is the division of operation, with an assistant director drawing a salary of $9,500 a year. In that division the salaries aggregate $137,000 a year. Mr. President, no private business could be run as the Shipping Board has been conducted.

Then there is a supply and sales division with a director drawing a salary of $10,000, an assistant director, assistant counsel, assistant staff manager, and so forth, with salaries in that department aggregating $90,000 a year.

In the division of construction and repair there is an assistant to the director, with a salary of $10,000 a year; a manager of construction, with a salary of $9,000 a year; two assistants— 1 at $7,500 a year and 1 at $7,000. So the whole list of salaries runs.

I do not know whether I shall put the entire list in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator ought to put it in the RECORD as a part of his remarks.

Mr. KENYON. It is merely a question of the expense of Mr. SMOOT. The list is not very long. I have a copy of it in my office, and I think that it ought to be put in the RECORD for the benefit of Senators.

Mr. KENYON. Then I ask, Mr. President, to insert in the RECORD the list of officers, solicitors, assistant solicitors, treasurers, and so forth, and their salaries in so far as I have been able to ascertain them and note them in pencil opposite their names, as they have been furnished to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The list referred to is as follows:

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he has computed the total of the overhead charges, including salaries and the pay of employees engaged by the Shipping Board?

Mr. KENYON. No; I have not; I was not able to total them up as I have not information as to all of the salaries. The list to which I have referred embraces only the officers, but in the book I have here, comprising some 60 or 70 pages closely typed, is a list of the employees. Their salaries are not given.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa vield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator referred a moment ago to the fact that Americans are not using American ships. Several weeks ago I was furnished information to the effect the Shipping Board made freight rates from Hamburg, Germany, to the Argentine on United States vessels which were less than the rates for similar cargoes to American merchants from New York to the same ports in the Argentine.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator please state that again? I lost the beginning of his statement.

Mr. POMERENE. The rates made by the United States Shipping Board for cargoes on United States vessels from Hamburg, Germany, to ports in the Argentine were less than the rates on United States ships from New York to the same ports in the Argentine for the same character of merchandise. The justification in the mind of the Shipping Board, I understand, seems to be that they want to get some of the carrying trade from Germany, but I do not quite understand why those rates should be less than the rates for our own manufacturers to the same ports. It is a very gross discrimination against our own business men.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator from Ohio, with the permission of the Senator from Iowa, if he has made inquiry whether a profit was derived on the shipments from Germany to the Argentine, or whether the Shipping Board had carried the cargoes at a loss or with just an even break, in order to establish the business?

Mr. POMERENE. No. Mr. President; I took this matter up with the Shipping Board and they promised to make an investigation. I have not had any report upon it since.

Mr. SMITH. I thought, perhaps, we might find, as we have in connection with some other of our governmental activities, that under certain laws we perform for foreigners certain services cheaper than we perform them for our own, and recoup ourselves by charging our own people higher rates than we charge the foreigners.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KENYON. I yield. Mr. POINDEXTER. I want to ask the Senator from Ohio if in investigating the particular matter to which he has just referred he ascertained whether or not the agent of the United States Shipping Board in Hamburg was a German or an Englishman or an American?

Mr. POMERENE. No, Mr. President; I know nothing about that. This matter was called to my attention by manufacturers of enamel ware who live and do business in Ohio.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, if we had a German agent for the Shipping Board in Hamburg he would be very much interested in making low rates for German shippers. asked the question because of the fact which I ascertained to exist some time ago-whether it has been remedied or changed at the present time I do not know-that, for instance, at Valencia, one of the important ports of Spain, where United States ships frequently call, the agent of the United States Shipping Board is the British consul. Although we have a consul there, they prefer to have a British consul to represent the Shipping Board; and, in view of the fact that many British ships are competing with the American ships at that port, it can readily be seen what the result will be.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yleld to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. So that American citizens who read the Record may be able to make comparisons as to the salaries paid to an auditor in the Shipping Board and the salaries paid to the auditors in the other departments, I want to call attention to what is paid to the Auditor for the War Department. salary is $4,000, not $15,000, as the auditor of the Shipping Board is paid. The salary of the chiefs of division is $2,500, instead of $10,000. The salary of the Auditor for the Navy Department is $4,000. The salary of the Auditor for the Interior Department is $4,000. There is not an auditor in the Government service, with the exception of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, who receives $5,000, whose salary is above $4,000; and yet we are paying the auditor of the Shipping Board $15,000 per annum.

Mr. KENYON. I understand, and I think an investigation would show it, and I am arguing for an investigation, that one of the assistant auditors is a chauffeur for one of the gentlemen drawing one of these large salaries. The whole thing ought to be investigated and the light thrown into it.

I have referred to some of the larger extravagances, and if Senators would look over the hearings of the House committee they would find that this thing has been reeking with graft, if the witnesses there are to be believed; but there are many small things and small extravagances. On one day I find nearly two pages of printing bills and vouchers, a list of vouchers running up, I should judge, between forty and fifty thousand dollars just one day of printing.

I think an investigation such as has been proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] would show the most flagrant abuse of the franking privilege; and while that may be a small matter, it is one of the little holes where the money is running

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator refers to the franking privilege. want to correct him and say that the Government of the United States has to pay for it.

Mr. KENYON. I meant as far as they are concerned. The Government is paying for these things.

I have here copies of some telegrams sent out by various gentlemen connected with the Shipping Board. I will not use their names, but I should like to see them in the investigation.

Here is a telegram, for instance, sent to some young lady down in Virginia:

Can not get down until Tuesday morning, Hotel Fairfax, 8.30.

That little message cost the Government only 25 cents. I do not know what it cost otherwise.

Here is another one:

Children go off Friday 3 o'clock, Dr., So-and-So. Shall follow Satur-ty unless I stop at Joplin.

That cost 25 cents.

Here is another one charged to the Government:

Please mail three blank checks to Shoreham Hotel. Missed Norfolk at. Go down Friday night.

Here is another one, advising some lady of traveling down another evening.

Mr. BORAH. Read it. Mr. KENYON. I think I will not read that one.

Here is another mighty message, sent at the expense of the Government:

Leave door open. Will be home about midnight to-night. (Signed) Ed.

Mr. McCORMICK. Where is that from, Mr. President?

Mr. KENYON. It is charged to the United States Shipping Board. These gentlemen are interested, some of them, not only in leaving the door open but in leaving the door open to the Federal Treasury.

These are small matters, of course.

Mr. SMITH. That telegram is from where to where? Mr. KENYON. The Senator can take it and see. Here is another one, charged up to the Government, from the United States Shipping Board, Princeton, N. J., to New York:

Very sorry, but oversold for Yale game,

The Government is apparently paying for messages to secure tickets for football games!

There are other messages, advising that checks had been received. I should like to see the light turned in on the way the Government money has been used in the larger matters and in the small matters. I am just presenting these as samples, There will be hundreds of them found if we can get an investi-

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, did the Senator ever inquire into the present expenses and number of employees of the famous Hog Island shipyard?

Mr. KENYON. In the list I put in this morning the officers are given, but not the employees

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator remember how many there are?

Mr. KENYON. No; I do not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My information is that there are something like 60 officers there, and about 40 employees under them; that practically all of the officers have automobiles at the expense of the Government, and many of them chauffeurs at the expense of the Government, besides personal clerks and secreteries. I am informed that there are about 40 men at work there.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, yes. It is not any wonder that the effort to get a merchant marine in this country has met with so many discouragements.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me just a moment? My colleague referred to a matter that I took up with the Shipping Board some little time ago, and inquired of them in reference to it. I did not think about its coming up this morning, so I have not the letter here; but I will say to my colleague and to the Senate that in a letter, I think from Admiral Benson, he showed that while there is a condition that probably needs correcting, it is not anything like so bad as has been reported.

Mr. KENYON. I hope not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The report that I received I referred to my colleague, and I suppose—

Mr. JONES of Washington. I took it up and submitted it to Admiral Benson.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Washington that I think if they were not kept at Hog Island, they would be brought down here to Washington anyhow.

Mr. KENYON. Of course a good deal of this that came out in the House hearings is old matter; but it seems to me it was not followed up sufficiently, and that we should follow it up by this resolution, and do that before we condemn the effort to have a merchant marine.

On page 1805, Part V, of the House hearings, Mr. Richardson, on the stand, speaking of the work of the subcontractor, Savs:

He would perform the work, usually, at a profit of 50 plus 10, or in case of a lump sum he would allow himself a profit of 50 per cent, according to the statements of some of the contractors, add 25 per cent for acts of God or unforeseen exigencies, pass the bill on back to the middleman, who would add his profit of approximately 25 per cent, pass the bill on back to the contractors, who would pass it on back to the Shipping Board auditor, who would approve the prices, and the bill would be paid by the operator.

The Chairman. Now, you have specific instances of that?

Mr. Richardson. Yes, sir.

The Chairman. Do you know of any instances where any refund has been made?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir; in the case of W. P. Wilkins, $5,000; numerous other cases.

The Chairman, Subparagraph (e), "Corruption of United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation employees and officials," Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation employees and omclais, page 15.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you knowledge of that existing?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Without citing the specific instances at this time, will you state how it was accomplished?

Mr. RICHARDSON. In some cases by outright bribery, by money. In some cases, as in Norfolk, by the gifts of stock in the company. In other cases by the promise of positions, which were later given. In still other cases by the promise of money, which was never paid, but was promised.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom were these bribes or this corruption given or exercised?

Mr. RICHARDSON. In some cases by a contractor seeking to buy materials from the Fleet Corporation; in other cases by repairmen seeking to get improper work passed or improper payrolls passed or improper bills approved by auditors and paid. A great deal of the bribery was in the form of whisky at $25 a quart.

And so on all through these hearings-launching parties, gifts of silverware to wives of inspectors, every kind of cheap graft that has gone on.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator refers to a resolution. Is there a resolution pending providing for an inquiry?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Utah [Mr. King] on yesterday introduced a resolution asking for an investigation.

Mr. EDGE. Has that resolution been considered? Has it been passed?

Mr. KENYON. It has gone to the committee. Oh, no; it has not been passed. It has been referred to a committee.

Mr. EDGE. Can the Senator advise me offhand whether the resolution provides for consideration of the possibilities of really administering a governmental-owned merchant marine, as well as going into this terrible history of the past?

Mr. KENYON. I am somewhat doubtful about that. Mr. EDGE. While there is absolutely no question, as was developed by the House hearings, that committees could investigate and have sensational results daily, founded on fact, it seems to me that what the American people are particularly interested in is whether or not, with this three and a half billion dollar expenditure—which represents a present inventory value of less than a billion, meaning that we would have to write off in the ordinary business way over two billion dollars to-day if we looked at it as it certainly exists-it is practical to have the merchant marine administered by the Government under existing laws.

If a resolution is pending looking to an investigation I sincerely hope it will be reported by the committee in a form that will include an examination into the fundamental fact as to whether it is possible to maintain and administer a merchant marine at the present rate of loss, as the Senator has developed. of from half a million to a million dollars a day in overhead expenses.

With a tonnage which is admitted to be about 650,000,000, at a value of something in the neighborhood of $700,000,000, in two years, going along on the present basis, we would have absolutely no inventory or valuation. As the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Warren] very aptly stated yesterday in considering this resolution, we had better burn the ships, sink the ships, or do something, if it does not impede navigation, and we are not liable under the law, rather than deliberately go along in such a way that an ordinary computation of figures shows that we will simply wipe out the entire three and a half billions in two years' time.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator; but does he not think it important, in finding out whether we can carry on a merchant marine and in forming the judgment of the American people on that question, that they shall know how the money has been spent? You could not carry on a merchant marine, the way the money has been spent, if $20 gold pieces grew on trees, ready to pluck them off; so that that does enter into the whole matter.

Mr. EDGE. I admit, Mr. President, that it is always a beneficial object lesson, in considering future administration and policy, to be able to show up the fallacies of the past, if they exist; but I think these things are very generally admitted. I think that the facts have been brought out almost sufficiently in the House investigation; and while to an extent we are all ready to be charitable and charge up some of those mistakes and extravagances to war necessities, I think we should think a great deal more of the future.

If it is the wisdom of Congress to provide sufficient appropriations to continue the merchant marine, it probably should be based on a new policy of administration for the future, and consideration should be given by the proper committee, the Committee on Commerce, to a policy for the future.

Personally, I am not particularly interested in all these difficulties of the past, or these salaries. Since the Senator has asked the question, I would rather see a man have a salary of $10,000 a year, an admitted expert in his work, than to have two or three War Department auditors, perhaps, at $4,000 a year; and it is admitted that in some of the older departments of the Government we have many more employees than are necessary

Mr. KENYON. If he accomplishes the results.

Mr. EDGE. If he accomplishes the results. A business man at the head of the Shipping Board, with an investment of three and a half billien dollars, must have men who are able to do the work, and I would rather see one man at $10,000 on that board than four at $3,000, or whatever the amounts might be.

Mr. KENYON. If they did the work and brought the re-marine has not had a fair trial.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not entirely familiar with this subject, and I should like to ask the Senator a question. Who is responsible for the derelictions to which the Senator has been calling attention? How can it happen, and is there anything being provided in the way of preventives for the future?

Mr. KENYON. How can it happen, as the testimony shows, that some inspector is presented with an automobile by the establishments which may be doing the work? Things of that nature have taken place, just a looseness and a dishonesty on the part of the people who do that kind of thing. That sort of thing exists in the world.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the whole thing resolve itself into the question whether or not we can get honest and efficient men to administer this situation?

Mr. KENYON. I think it does. If we can get an efficient man to take hold of this and clean out the grafters and spend the money in such a way as to make a public dollar go nearly as far as a private dollar goes, then there would be a fair chance.

Mr. BORAH. Who constitutes the Shipping Board now?

Mr. KENYON. There is no Shipping Board.

Mr. SMOOT. Admiral Benson.
Mr. KENYON. There is only one man, practically, on the Shipping Board now. I saw by the papers that the appointments were to be made to-day, but I do not know anything about it.

Mr. BORAH. Are we appropriating money for nobody to spend?

Mr. KENYON. This is a deficiency appropriation of $75,-000,000, a large part of which has been spent.

Mr. SMOOT. Nearly all of it has been spent.

Mr. WARREN. There is $25,000,000 appropriated at one in the bill, and then at another place, which we have already passed, there is $36,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. How much has been spent? How much is purely a deficiency appropriation?

Mr. WARREN. In presenting estimates for deficiencies they reckon up to June 30, and the House concluded, from the testimony given before the House committee, that they could get along up to the 30th of June, or nearly so, if given thirty-six million and some odd thousand dollars for one part of the industry and $25,000,000 for another. The Senate committee has simply added $50,000,000.

The Senator and others will notice that in the testimony they claim, it is doubtful whether with only this sixty-odd million they can run up to that time, and they figured they would be left without a dollar of funds to do business with, and on a market that was flat with some unfinished ships; that it was impossible to sell anything, any item of material or shipping, and that they must have, as working capital, something to carry them over the first of the year and to get straightened up.

As the Senator knows, this board went all to pieces, and the President asked Admiral Benson, who was a retired naval officer, to keep charge of it, and to go on until there could be a filling in of the places on the board. It seems that the President has taken a great deal of time, and justly so, to get a board which may cooperate and may reorganize this institution to a certain extent.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KENYON. I yield,

Mr. POINDEXTER. I want to ask the Senator from Wyoming what period of time is covered by this deficiency provided for in this bill?

Mr. WARREN. It is a deficiency covering the year 1921. I can not give the Senator the months or the dates.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator does not know how long it takes to accumulate a deficiency of $75,000,000?

Mr. WARREN. It does not take very long, if we may judge by some experiences in the past.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Iowa suggests to me three months' time. At that rate the Shipping Board is quite an expensive institution, if you add to the appropriations which have already been made a deficiency of $75,000,000 every

I have talked with some men familiar with the affairs of the Shipping Board, in whose statements I have considerable confidence, and they inform me that in the accumulated interest accruing from day to day upon claims which are owed by the Shipping Board to contractors and others, which they positively refuse to settle or liquidate, in the deterioration of ships, and in the losses in the operation of ships, the United States Government is suffering a loss of anywhere from a million dollars a day, as a minimum, up to three or four million dollars

Mr. WARREN. I am not disposed to go into that statement, but I will ask the Senator in return, what are you going to do What are you going to do with the Shipping Board?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If I had anything to do with it, would wipe the Shipping Board out of existence and appoint some director, some one man, with undivided authority under the law, to liquidate its affairs.

Mr. WARREN. How is he going to liquidate them? Mr. POINDEXTER. By getting rid of these ships.

Mr. WARREN. He can not get rid of them, even at $500 apiece, as the testimony of Admiral Benson shows.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There are about 40 wooden ships, constructed by the Shipping Board at an enormous cost, up in Union Lake.

Mr. WARREN. No; we have 272 ships, and a lot of hulls besides; but they have sold a few of the hulls.

Mr. CALDER. If I had my way about it, I would sink them l. They ought to be sunk. We would save money for the Government if that were done.

Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. JONES of Washington addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to all these Senators?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to all of them, but I yield to the Senator from Washington [Mr. Poindexter] first.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I only wanted to complete the sentence I started, as to an example I have seen showing the need for some action in closing up at least part of the business of the Shipping Board.

There is a great fleet of wooden ships in Union Lake, which is a small lake in the city of Seattle. Shortly after they were built they were anchored in that lake. I think that has been about two years ago now. They were built at enormous expense, and I think there are something like 40 of them. They have simply been riding at anchor there in that lake for two years, and I suppose unless somebody comes along who realizes the advisability of doing something with them, they will be kept there until they fall to pieces from rot.

Mr. JONES of Washington and Mr. WARREN rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator from Washington, who was on the floor.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Washington will pardon me just a moment, I want to give his colleague the figures regarding the question he asked. This is the testimony of Admiral Benson before the Senate committee when he was asked how far they were running behind now. He said he supposed they would run behind less hereafter. The amount they are running behind at the present time, he says, is between four and five million a month.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There are many things he did not take into account.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I hope that we will not allow our indignation at what appears to be reckless extravagance, and possibly even worse than that, warp our judgment as to what we really ought to do in the situation which confronts us. I am not going to take the time of the Senator from Iowa-

Mr. KENYON. I just want a moment more, and then the Senator can take the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely want to call attention to the facts with reference to this alleged deficiency. House provided $36,000,000, in round numbers, for what is called a deficiency for the present year. But that is to complete or carry on the construction of ships which are now under way.

Mr. WARREN. And nearly finished.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And nearly finished. These are contracts which were not canceled, because, when the matter came up, it was considered that it would mean a greater loss to the Government to cancel the contracts than to carry them Of course, nobody could foresee all the conditions which confront us now. Our hindsight is always better than our foresight, and I am not here to criticize the people who passed upon this question. But that is what the first $36,000,000 is for, and the $25,000,000 additional which the House provided in the bill is not a deficiency and is not to take care of the operation of ships, but it is to carry on the construction of these ships in the year 1922.

The Senate committee have divided it. We left thirty-six million to carry on the construction this year, and then we put the other under the head of emergencies, and added to it what we thought ought to be allowed in order to carry on the ships.

I thought I ought to make that statement.

I am much obliged to the Senator. I have Mr. KENYON. about completed my statement, Mr. President. I rose merely to make the two points I have tried to make. I want to see this go on if it possibly can. I want to see our flag on every sea, and I want a great merchant marine. I think it is necessary for the future progress and prosperity of our Nation. But unless these expenses can be cut, the American people are not going to stand for this kind of a proposition. That is why I am urging this investigation and this cutting down of these wasteful expenditures.

The second point I tried to make was that unless the American people themselves are willing to stand behind a merchant marine, to patronize American boats, ship in American bottoms, and sail under the Stars and Stripes, giving the merchant marine that great moral impetus, patriotic impulse, you can not build up a merchant marine.

In that line I want to have read as a part of my remarks an article published in one of the Washington papers a few days ATMID HAY BY

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

"United States Ships Slighted, Say Board Heads-Have Black-list Naming Government Officials Who Prefer Competing

"The Shipping Board is considering asking President Harding to direct Government officials to travel on American ships, it was learned yesterday.

The board is spending thousands of dollars in national advertising bearing the slogan. 'Ship and sail under the Stars and But shipping news reports indicate this injunction is not being observed by those who could do most to further the board's ambition for building up the American merchant marine.

"A tabulation of recent sailings, privately referred to by Shipping Board officials as 'the blacklist,' bears many names of officials high in diplomatic ranks who have chosen to use British and other foreign ships in traveling to their posts.

"HARVEY ON BLACKLIST.

"Prominent on the list is the name of Col. George Harvey, newly appointed ambassador to the Court of St. James. for England on the Aquitania, of the British Cunard Line. The Old North State, one of America's newest and finest passengercarrying liners, sailed on the same day.

"Also included is the name of John Barton Payne, former Secretary of the Interior, who, while Chairman of the Shipping Board before entering the Cabinet, was particularly emphatic in his assertions that Americans should support their own merchant marine.

"YOUNG ROOSEVELT, TOO.

"Another name which has caused Shipping Board officials to express surprise and regret is that of Kermit Roosevelt, who, with his brother Archie, sailed on the Aquitania with Col. Har-Young Roosevelt not only is head of a shipping company but also the operator of several Shipping Board vessels which have been allocated to his company.

"Although Admiral Benson would make no comment for publication on the defection of prominent Americans from his request, it is no secret that he is both surprised and indignant.

"In discussing privately the latest of the board's worries, officials pointed out that in only one respect could foreign passenger vessels be conceded to possess an advantage over American ships. The latter are equally as speedy, fully as well appointed, and in many instances derive the benefits of more recent construction.

"Prohibition alone is the distinguishing feature, it was stated, but, of course, no one presumes to even intimate this distinction has any influence upon prominent Americans in selecting a foreign ship."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it has been claimed that the matter of prohibition cuts quite a figure with some people traveling across the ocean. I am inclined to think that perhaps more people will be attracted to ships where there is prohibition than will be induced to go on ships because there is no prohibition in force on the ships. So perhaps the thing offsets itself in that respect.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to testify from observation only that as to at least one of the American ships it is not dry. I think none of them are dry, so the Senator's argument does not apply.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps some people did not quite understand that when they engaged their transportation. In any event there may be some reason for this sort of practice, or what appears to be a practice, on the part of some Americans. Sometimes people can not get accommodations on American There are times when people have to sail within certain limits, and my information is that the ships going across the ocean now are crowded, and that coming back they are largely crowded. It is very difficult to engage transportation unless one does so months in advance, and it is possible that these distinguished gentlemen were unable to get accommodations on American ships, because those ships were fully booked at the time they applied for accommodations.

That is about the only respect, as I am informed, in which shipping is doing well—that is, the passenger businesscharges are pretty high, too, according to my information. There ought to be money in the transportation business so far as passenger carriers are concerned, but we do know that our foreign trade has fallen off enormously, and that our ships have to go with cargoes and return very often without cargoes, and that there is not money now being earned in the shipping business so far as the transportation of commodities is concerned. The freight carriers, generally, are not doing a profitable business at present. There are exceptions, but cargo carriers are not enjoying the rich harvest they did during the World War.

There are a great many ships laid up. Many people who bought ships from the Shipping Board months ago at something like $200 a ton were utterly unable to carry out their contracts and threw the ships back on the Shipping Board. Some of themare claiming that they ought to be reimbursed the amount of the advances made on account of those purchases, because the price and values have gone down so much. We can build ships now much more cheaply than we could a few years ago. Ships are being constructed, it is claimed, now at $175 a ton that formerly cost $210 or $220 a ton.

The situation has materially changed from that which existed before the war and, of course, during the war. During the war there were excessively high rates. Some people made as much as the value of the ship on one journey, one turn around, one voyage. Again, in one instance the Shipping Board made $450,000 net on one voyage of one ship built by the Shipping Board and in another instance nearly $500,000 net. Now they are losing money. The operating expenses are high, the cargoes are lacking. They can not get the kind of cargoes they would like to have, that would pay the best rates and give the best return. They are doing the best they can, but the business is demoralized. Commerce has been disorganized, particularly our foreign trade, very largely, and the Shipping Board has been losing money—not only the Shipping Board but operators generally. Shipowners have been losing money as to freight-carrying ships.

I realize that there has been an enormous waste in connection with the building of the merchant marine. In 1914 we had 2,200,000 tons of shipping under the American flag. That was the total number of tons then under the American flag, exclusive, of course, of the coastwise and Great Lakes ships. We now have 12,400,000 tons under the American flag.

Mr. POMERENE. That does not include the Lakes? Mr. FLETCHER. I am speaking of overseas shipping. I am not referring to coastwise shipping, but only to overseas shipping.

A large portion of that tonnage is tied up and out of business, because the business is not there. Recently I had a statement bearing on that subject, and while perhaps it is not entirely appropriate at this time to go into that question fully, yet this might be somewhat enlightening.

We have 1,388 steel steamers, 981 of which are oil burners and the balance coal burners. There are 978 in active service and 251 tied up. Vessels of many private owners are tied up in many instances. The business is not there at present, but the Vessels of many private owners are tied up in business will return. All the wooden ships are tied up-269. The chairman of the committee said 271, but my memorandum states that there are 269. There have been sold 439 ships by the Shipping Board. They have advertised ships and are offering them for sale, but they find no bidders now. As I said a while ago, they did sell some of those ships, but the purchasers have turned them back and refused to take them, because they claim that they can buy ships now at a good deal less; and, of course, they can do that, and so they can not afford to go on with their contract to buy the ships.

There is no question but that the merchant marine is just as essential to the prosperity and progress of the country as any enterprise upon which we can engage. It is essential for the national defense. Merchant ships are just as necessary in the national defense as are dreadnaughts, cruisers, torpedo boats, and torpedo-boat destroyers. If the Great War taught us any lesson at all it is the lesson that England could never have waged, much less won, the war even with our help and the help of other countries without her merchant ships.

She lost in one quarter 12,000,000 tons of her merchant ships and she was within a month almost of absolute collapse by reason of the depredations of the submarines. But we began our building program, and we were finally able to build them faster than the Germans could sink them. We built some of the ships at enormous cost, I grant you, accompanied with great waste, because we had to sacrifice economy for speed. The world's cry was for ships, and we proceeded to build the ships.

We need those ships now not only for our commerce but we need them as necessary in every war for national defense. have to have the merchant ships to transport our commerce and carry our supplies and move our men and our munitions and our material requirements generally.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state what will cause restoration of commerce to bring activity to those ships again? Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, I am hoping that eventually we will approach somewhere near what has been designated in high places as a status of normalcy; at any rate, that there will be a readjustment of world affairs and that after a while Europe will get on her feet, the world will recover from its present illness, people will get sane again, and we will all move forward. I will say to the Senator that, for instance, if we look back in history to the years following Waterloo in 1815, there was another period when all Europe was disturbed as practically she is to-day. It took about 12 years to recover from that condition and for Europe to get rehabilitated or steadied and in position to go ahead again. The inevitable consequences of the mighty shock and destruction of such a deadly conflict can not be recovered from in a year or two. Quite a little time, depending on the extent of the upheaval, is required.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think the enactment of the proposed high tariff with barriers against trade with other countries will improve the business of this merchant marine

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is most unfortunate for us to take a minute in considering the tariff question at this time, because the conditions of the world are too unsettled and too changeable. They are changing and shifting from day to day. We do not need tariff legislation now, and I think it would be a mistake to enact a permanent tariff law at this time because of those changing conditions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator understands that that is the program of the administration and that Congress proposes to enact a high protective tariff for the purpose of erecting trade barriers against commerce with other countries.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course if that is done it is going to limit our trade. It will undoubtedly reduce importations. It will lessen the power of Europe to recover because Europe can not pay us in gold the debt she owes us. She can only pay that debt in goods, in commodities, very largely.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yet we are proposing in this bill to appropriate something like $100,000,000 for the building or the completion of ships which will be still more idle after a high protective tariff measure is enacted by Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. I still have hopes that the tariff legislation will not be of such a character as to prohibit the importation of foreign goods.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I compliment the Senator on his great

Mr. FLETCHER. I hope that before such a tariff law is actually put upon the statute books the people ci the country will realize the unwisdom of making duties so high as to keep out importations to that extent. It will have a bad effect in any case, in my judgment; but, as I said, world conditions are so changeable and so chifting from day to day that it seems to me it is not an opportune time to enact any permaner' legislation of that character now. However, I still hope that the manufacturers, those engaged in agriculture and the various other industries of the country, will be able to see that we can not dispose of our goods and our products in foreign markets unless we take goods in exchange for those products to a large extent, and that they will insist that there shall not be imposed such duties as will exclude from this country foreign commodities and products.

While I admit that all this extravagance that has been talked about is very disturbing, and of course no one can excuse it, still there are conditions, it seems to me, that ought to be taken into consideration. Those are not traceable to the Shipping Board. There have been some reckless, careless, neglectful transactions on the part of some clerk here and yonder. Perhaps the chief of the particular division or bureau or enterprise in which he is employed ought to be held responsible for it, but because some clerk sends a foolish telegram and charges it to the Government, is that any reason for condemning a great institution such as the Shipping Board ought to be and in my judgment has been? There have been occurrences of that which we can not excuse and those implicated of course ought to be dismissed from the service, and we ought to get down to an economical basis and have those people go to work, and limit their expenditures to legitimate purposes and conduct affairs on strict business lines.

On the other hand there have been very great disadvantages under which the Shipping Board has labored. In the first place, it was complained at the time that the President failed to appoint members of the Shipping Board as promptly as they should have been appointed. There was delay in that instance, and before the Shipping Board got fairly functioning two members resigned and two other members had to be put on. was again delay in filling the board. Soon after that had happened, and before the board got a thorough grasp of the whole condition and began operating successfully, there were other resignations. The board has been changing in that way from time to time ever since it was first organized. I do not mean to criticize anybody, for I can understand the difficulty the President has had in finding the right men for those important positions; but I had hoped when the President took hold in March, we having failed to confirm the other members of the Shipping Board who had been appointed by the last administration, that we should have here the first week of the session nominations for the Shipping Board; but from March 4 until to-day, June 3, practically three months, we have been without a Shipping Board. How can we expect a wise and judicious and efficient administration of a great board under circumstances such as those?

The chairman of the board is acting under some sort of an executive order from the President. I do not know whether there is any law for that, but I rather question it. We have, however, no Shipping Board, and I doubt if there is any authority to do anything anywhere, so far as that organization is concerned. We are, as it were, using a strong-arm method and trying to save the situation as best we may. It is a pity that such a condition has existed.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Harris in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Jersey? Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. I simply desire to suggest to the Sénator from Florida that I am sure he will agree, relying on information afforded us by the public press, that the present President of the United States has certainly been using every possible endeavor to find the best equipped men, so far as their past business association and success are concerned, apparently, in order that the very mistakes-if they have been mistakes-of the past may be corrected. I am sure the Senator will admit from following the public prints that the President has been making most unusual efforts in order to try to bring to the service of the Government the strongest and best-equipped men whom it is possible to locate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I believe that: I think it has been the President's aim and effort to find the right men to put in charge of this great work. I have said I realized his difficulties in that respect; but I am stating it as a fact that the conditions which I have pointed out have existed almost from the beginning of the life of the organization. Consequently there has been more or less of looseness, of demoralization in the actual administration of the affairs of the Shipping Board, I hope that we shall get away from that; but I do not want to see the Shipping Board go down.

If we do not now establish an American merchant marine, adequate to serve this country, to serve the commerce and the industry of the United States, so that we shall never again be a beggar of ships, a fettered and embargoed trafficker on the seas, I do not know that time will ever arrive when we may do it. Unless we do it now, we shall never in our lifetime see a decent American merchant marine. It will not do to cripple the Shipping Board by failing to take care of these necessary expenditures, these deficiencies, these items for which they have already made contracts and incurred obligations in order to enable them to complete the ships which are from 80 to 90 per cent finished. We do not want to sacrifice those ships. It will not do to compel the Shipping Board to put upon the auction block 1,676 merchant ships and to let them go to the highest Those 1,676 merchant ships aggregate 10,837,000 tons bidder. of shipping. We should not put them up at auction and let them go. Who would get them? Three or four operators; merely a handful of big operating companies would own the merchant ships of the United States, which we have built with the people's money. The people of the United States bought Liberty bonds, paid for them, and a considerable portion of the proceeds of those bonds went into the construction of these ships, at a cost of three billion seven hundred odd million

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to complete my statement by saying that these ships belong to the people of the United States. We have no business to throw them away or to sacrifice them. Now I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Would the Senator from Florida be kind enough to give us his idea as to why American enterprise does not take the direction of going "down to the sea in Why is it that private individual enterprise in America does not take that direction?

Mr. FLETCHER. It has not done so heretofore, Mr. President, I think, largely because our attention has been directed to the development of this great country of ours, and there was more profit and greater prospects of gain on land than on the sea. There is not any question, however, that there has been profit in shipping. The British people have made money in their shipping enterprises; the people of every other maritime nation have made money in that way; there is money in the business. Of course, it takes a good deal of capital to build or acquire and operate ships. It is not a business which requires only small capital.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will; certainly

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Would the Senator be in favor of allowing American enterprise to buy ships wherever it can buy them and give them the protection of the American flag on the high seas?

Mr. FLETCHER. As I understand the Senator's question, I am in favor of that absolutely. Let Americans buy ships wherever they will. I want to encourage American enterprise; I do not mean to discourage American enterprise in this venture at all; but we have reached a point in this country where American enterprise has utterly failed to supply this great need; we have for 50 years been endeavoring to encourage private enterprise to build ships; but we only had, in 1914, 2,200,000 tons of shipping under our flag, which was 4,000,000 tons less than we had in 1861. The American merchant marine was going back; we were losing our status on the seas; we were not increasing our merchant marine at all; private enterprise failed us absolutely; so that there was nothing to do but for the Government to build ships, and we went in and built them. We built them with the people's money; the people own them; we have no right to scrap them, and we must not scrap them. We must manage so that we can place them in the hands of private enterprise wherever there is opportunity to do so without absolutely giving them away or selling them for a song. I am willing to encourage private enterprise.

But, Mr. President, the intimation is here that the Government is incapable of operating merchant ships; that the Government is not fit or competent to conduct an enterprise of this kind. The Senator will recall that when during the World War there was a question of insuring hulls and cargoes on the high seas, and private companies were appealed to to furnish insurance, they said, "We can not do it"; and they themselves came down to Washington and appealed to the Government to establish the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in order that their ships and their cargoes might be insured on the ocean. The Government took that action and made money out of it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida another question, if he will permit me. Is it not his understanding that in order to have American registry and the protection of the American flag the ship itself must be built on this side of the water; and whether it is not his understanding that the so-called foreign ships which carry a large share of our foreign commerce are owned by American citizens in New York and elsewhere?

Mr. FLETCHER. That was the case very largely before 1914; but we have provided in the law now that these ships may only be sold to American citizens until we exhaust the home market. We have granted some authority now to offer them to foreign markets if they can not be sold here; but the ships that are sold now must fly the American flag and be owned by American citizens. It is true, as the Senator suggests, that in 1914 American capital was invested to the extent of some $100,000,000 in ships flying foreign flags and that situation continues to-day. It is also true that only ships built in American yards could obtain American registry. We modified that law in 1914. It was originally enacted to help build up Ameri-can yards and promote the shipbuilding industry. Its effect was to discourage American ownership and American shipping. Since August 8, 1914, foreign-built vessels may have American registry for foreign trade if American owned. In certain instances they may be admitted to the coastwise trade also.

Mr. President, I utterly repudiate the notion that necessarily the Government is unfit, incompetent, and incapable of operating merchant ships; that necessarily there is going to be failure; that there must be rascality and graft and dishonesty and waste and failure finally in the operation of the ships if the Government undertakes that task. I would much rather see the ships operated by private enterprise than for the Government to undertake that business, if it can be done, so as to save these ships for American owners and for the American flag, for the benefit of American commerce and American industry; again say that there is absolutely no necessity for failure if the Government itself undertakes to operate the ships. Australia is operating her merchant marine now and operates it quite successfully; Canada is doing so; the Government of the United States has been operating a line quite successfully from New York to Panama for years, and is operating it now, right bring.

alongside of privately owned ships. England is operating her telephones, telegraphs, and cables successfully and is doing that right alongside of private enterprise, and is operating also some ships right alongside of private enterprise. There is no reason why this Government can not operate its ships without any serious loss—there may be a temporary loss here and there until the time arrives when we can dispose of them upon a fair, just, and proper basis and have them go then into the hands of private owners, but always flying our flag and owned by American citizens.

It is said that the wooden ship is a total failure. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has referred to the number of wooden ships tied up in Seattle Harbor going to destruction. Of course the steamers of wooden construction have not been profitable ships. They were built as an emergency matter. We had to build them quickly and fast, and build them out of anything we could. There was a time in those days when I should have been willing, if I could not have gotten anything else to build ships with, to build them out of gold in order to take supplies to our 2,000,000 men in Europe, rather than have them starve or suffer. We had to build the ships, and build them in the quickest way we could. We had to build them out of anything we could get hold of that would be serviceable; and they did serve a purpose, too. Many of these ships have carried cargoes around the world. They are not as profitable as some other types, but they are not wholly useless,

I wrote the other day to the Oregon Pine Co. (Inc.), of Portland, Oreg., and inquired about one of these Ferris-type wooden ships which that company bought from the Shipping Board. They paid some $40,000 for the ship, and they converted her into a six-masted schooner. They said:

In reply to your letter of May 3, requesting information as to the value of converted Ferris-type ships, we are pleased to inform you that during the early part of 1920 we purchased from the Emergency Fleet Corporation two hulls, known as the "Peninsula type." These two hulls we converted into six-masted schooners, and placed them in the lumber-carrying service between the Columbia River and Australia. These ships have proven to be splendid sailers, and, with the stability of shipping rates, will prove a profitable investment to their owners. Wwwill be pleased to give you were information should it so please.

will be pleased to give you more information should it so please

This letter is dated May 9, 1921. That is what can be done with these wooden ships. They can be converted into sailers. They are less expensive to operate. We do not need fast, rapid transit across the ocean so much now. Take the machinery out of them and convert them into sailers. They are proving profitable. Every experiment made with them has do nonstrated that, and this is a direct statement of a concern that took two of them and used them in that way.

I have another letter here from W. L. Comyn & Co., of San Francisco. They say that the Anne Comyn is the only ship that has so far completed a round trip. She was one of these wooden steamers converted into a sailing vessel, and she made on that trip $43,547.54 net profit.

So the experience thus far is that these wooden ships are not worthless. There is no need to say that the money that has been put into those ships has been wasted and thrown away. They can be sold and converted into sailers and operated profitably in carrying lumber and other freight of that sort.

Perhaps it is not quite in order now to discuss gene. ally the operations of the Shipping Board as to constructing and handling and allocating these ships. Many of the questions propounded in the resolution offered by the Senator from Utah can be very readily answered. I have already answered some of them in these remarks. I have no objection to any inquiry you want to make about the Shipping Board and its transactions, but we do not get very far in these investigations. The Commerce Committee, year before last, spent some six months investigating the Shipping Board and trying to encourage particularly the construction of ships at that time. The House committee has made an extended investigation of the Shipping Board.

We find these items of recklessness and extravagance and waste here and there, but what we want to do is to get the Shipping Board on its feet. Let us have a Shipping Board, You have none now. You have not had any for some time past-practically for a year. Let us get it established, and when that is done there is no reason why we can not, through that board, operate these ships in such a way as will not only not harm private enterprise and private lines but will encourage rather than otherwise those lines, open up new routes of trade, and carry our flag to every port in Christendom; and that should be done. Now is the opportune time to do it. We do not need to, and we could not if we wanted to, dispose of these ships or the material on hand at anything like what it should

Some mention has been made of high salaries. I do not know what date that applies to. Will the Senator state whether those high salaries are being paid to-day, or are they salaries that were paid some time ago? I have been assured by the chairman of the board that the expenses of the Shipping Board recently have been reduced some seven or eight million dollars per annum, and that that reduction is continuing. I will ask the Senator whether that salary list is a list up to date or whether it applies to some months ago?

Mr. KENYON. I am not going to say, in view of the Senator's statement, that it is up to date. It is up to some months ago. If the reductions have been made, they have been made recently, and perhaps they have. I hope they have.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know that it is the purpose and the effort of the chairman at the present time to reduce expenses all along the line, the high salaries as well as the number of employees, and I am sure he has been doing that, as far as it was possible to do it; but there are conditions-such, for instance, as those at Hog Island-which can not be avoided. Some mention was made of the salaries paid at Hog Island and the number of employees there. That is a great storage depot-storage for ships and storage for supplies-and there are supplies and materials stored on Hog Island that cost the Shipping Board $40,000,000. They can not sell this material now, It can be sold ultimately. It consists in great part of steel plates and machinery. A lot of that material was brought there when the contract was let to build 35 "B" boats, as they termed them, 8,000-ton cargo carriers. They afterwards abandoned that contract entirely, and none of those boats were built there; consequently that material, which had already been or-dered, is lying there now at Hog Island. It is not going to rust or rot. It will be salable and there will be a market for it, but it must be taken care of in the meantime.

One hundred and twenty-two ships were built at Hog Island, and their record has been superb as far as their performance is concerned. I merely mention that. The Shipping Board undoubtedly has material of this kind at other places over the country, but you can not sell that material just at the moment. That, however, is no reason why we should refuse to maintain the Shipping Board and compel it to wind up its affairs and throw upon the market all the material and all the ships under its control.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I do not entirely agree with the optimism of the Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher] as to the possibility of complete success under governmental management in the administration of a merchant marine. However, I do not greatly disagree with him on the absolute necessity of maintaining a merchant marine; and I appreciate thoroughly and well understand how Senators who, because of other responsibilities and other committee assignments, are not entirely familiar with the details of the Shipping Board's activities as coming before the Committee on Commerce, of which I have the honor of being a member, when they hear of these $100,000,000 deficiency appropriations, would feel very reluctant to support them, and they would naturally develop a line of debate and discussion such as we have had this morning.

I agree thoroughly with the Senator from Florida that it would be a great mistake, absolutely beyond any correction, if we should dispose of the merchant marine in any way excepting by chartering or allocating it to going concerns in this country, under the American flag, with a certain amount of proper supervision over their activities. That, however, is not We are not meeting that particular responsibility to-day. We are considering a request for a very large deficiency appropriation; and, as I stated, I can well understand the feeling of opposition and censure and criticism that such an appropriation would develop when we recognize the apparent failure of the merchant marine under existing conditions.

Senators should know, the country should know, as accurately as it is possible to secure the information, why it is necessary to ask, on the basis of the requests before us, for from two hundred to three hundred million dollars a year for the merchant marine in the way of a deficit; that is, that much in addition to their income from operation. It is relatively the greatest expense that the Government is facing, because, of course, with the Army and the Navy we actually have no income. From the merchant marine we have a tremendous income, and this amount of from two to three hundred million dollars represents purely a deficit over and above the income.

I believe we perhaps have been somewhat neglectful in not securing real information. We should not simply make investigations which bring out errors of the past in this or that or any other individual cases, but we have not secured, as far as it tion and administration, so that the American people and the Congress will understand the necessity for these deficiency appropriations. As I understand, they must be granted or the Shipping Board will be absolutely compelled to close its doors: but I think we should have more detailed information as to what the future prospects are and the policy of administration, rather than bothering very much with the water that has gone over the dam and bringing out failures and mistakes of policy in the past. They may in some way help us to avoid a recurrence of the same conditions in the future; but it is my judgment that in the investigations of the House committee, which extended over a period of a number of months, they certainly endeavored to secure all the information that they could, meeting almost daily. The results of that investigation appeared in practically all the newspapers of the country; and I should very much regret to see the Senate start again on that type of an investigation as a solution of the problems of the merchant marine and its policy. As I said, I think the American people want to know what the future holds forth and what we can promise them in a continuation of these very large appropriations in order to maintain that service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think that the most needful thing to do with the shipping problem right now is to have a strictly first-class board appointed, or reappointed, however that may be; get the board organized and at work, and then aid that board in making the shipping business a success?

Mr. EDGE. Certainly, Mr. President; there can not be any question as to that. I remarked, in interrupting the Senator from Florida, I think while the Senator from Tennessee was out of the Chamber, that I think we must admit that the President is certainly making every effort to secure the services of the best type of men, in order that the very best possible business experience can be enlisted in the service of the Government. It is a matter of great regret to every American, I am sure, to know, as they must know by following the accounts in the public press, of the lack of success in the one or two efforts the President has made to secure the type of men who, through experience in the past, could carry out the big contracts and handle the big problems to be solved, as near as it is humanly possible to find them. It is a matter of great regret that up to the present moment apparently he has been unsuccessful.

But my remarks, Mr. President, are directed mainly to the resolution now pending, offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] yesterday, of which I have a copy here. It requests information of the same old character, as to liabilities, actual or contingent, of the Shipping Board, and as to ships chartered, and where chartered, and so forth.

Only yesterday, following, I am informed, the work of a number of auditors at the department covering a period of several months, we received a report from the Shipping Board, a very voluminous report, of some two or three hundred pages. It was in response to a resolution I had introduced in the last Congress, and I have had an opportunity of only glancing over it. It is a public document, and it is my judgment that the report is a most comprehensive one. I believe it covers largely all that is requested by the pending resolution. Certainly the main features are covered by this report.

If a resolution were introduced to authorize the Senate Commerce Committee, or a subcommittee, to make an inquiry as to future prospects, future policies, and matters relating to the actual administration of the merchant marine, so that the country could get it perhaps a little more clearly, I think such a resolution would probably be entirely in order.

In the meantime I do hope that the appropriation, which is the direct business before the Senate, will be allowed. I know it is hard, in a way, to defend a business which shows a continuing deficit, but, as has been stated before by other Senators, we all appreciate the present business depression; we all know perfectly well that it is absolutely impossible to liquidate the merchant marine to-day and receive anything that would be even worth while. Any board ordered to liquidate it to-day would receive proper censure, in my judgment, all over the country, for selling the ships at such prices as they would have to take at this time. It can not be liquidated now. There is a certain amount of what may be termed junk, the wooden ships, and ships that never will be used, which I think could be sold at auction, and we might as well sell them to-day. I do not think it would be bad business judgment to do so.

any other individual cases, but we have not secured, as far as it is possible to secure them, the plans of the Shipping Board, or that part of the Shipping Board that remains, for future opera-1 of real going ships, modern ships, which can be administered at a profit when business conditions are near normal, preferably under private control, and the Government's responsibility is to adopt a definite policy for their future conduct.

The other problem of the Shipping Board is the problem of liquidation. That part of the fleet represents an output of millions for which we can probably receive but a few hundred thousand to-day, and then retain the ships which are worth

The two responsibilities are absolutely distinct. I question very much whether the new Shipping Board should connect those two responsibilities at all.

I believe it would be very good business to put the matter of liquidation in the hands of professional liquidators to get clear of the useless ships at the earliest possible moment in the best possible way, definitely deciding what part of the assets are not useful for any future operation. Do not have the useless ships so directly connected with the operation of a going concern that they hold it back continuously by the tremendous depreciation cost and charge on capital that is naturally considered when operating as one activity.

So, Mr. President, recognizing thoroughly the reason for criticism, and that it is justified, I sincerely hope that we will not get entirely discouraged. It is too great an asset in times of war or in times of general business development; it is too important, in my judgment, as a means through which we can finally, whatever our tariff policy is, dispose of our surplus products; and let me say right here that as we do not have a market for our surplus products in this country, and we do not have a method of transporting them, then America can not, in my judgment, return to a full degree of prosperity, because we stimulated production and development in this country because of the war to such an extent that we can not be prosperous to a full measure of prosperity by simply confining our business to ourselves. When I speak of surplus products, I mean the difference between what we consume at home and what we must find a market for abroad.

There can not be any question but that we must look at the merchant marine, then, to some extent as a liability, as it must be and will be, I am afraid, for years, so far as its actual cost of operation is concerned; but we must look upon it to some extent as one of those necessary auxiliaries to the general development of the prosperity of the country.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I do not know that I can add to the statements which have been made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Edge]. We have this great fleet of worthless wooden ships on our hands. At the close of the war, when the armistice was signed, we made the great mistake of not cutting off at once our entire shipbuilding program. But the last administration and the Shipping Board talked of balancing the fleet, and Congress advanced large sums of money for that purpose, and to-day we have uncompleted ships on the ways to finish for which we are obligated to spend many million dollars. That policy was wrong, but it is water that has passed over the dam, and we are through with it. This side of the Chamber can not be charged with the shipbuilding program during the war and the years immediately following the war.

If I had my way, I would either sink the wooden ships, and do away with the expense of looking after them, or I would put them up at auction, and let anyone have them who would take them away, if only for firewood.

We have of course this great fleet of steel vessels, most of them, in fact very nearly all of them, useful ocean carriers. Somehow, some way, we must develop a means of utilizing them for the benefit of the country and, as the Senator from New Jersey said, carrying our surplus products overseas.

Mr. President, this great fleet of ocean vessels served a useful purpose in the war. We took over and completed a great many ships for which contracts were made by individuals before we started our shipbuilding program. In addition, many ships were built by the Government itself which were used in the latter days of the war. We do not talk of loss in the ordnance we shot away, nor in money spent in the aircraft program, and it does seem to me that we can properly charge a good portion of the shipbuilding to the cost of the war.

Another phase of the situation most men have lost sight of is that in the years 1919 and 1920 we carried a tremendous trade overseas, and a big commerce was carried back to us. Mr. President, that business was carried in the main by vessels flying the American flag, which were constructed and owned by the Shipping Board. I believe a careful analysis of the facts will show that those ships nearly paid for themselves in the two years I have referred to. So, after all, the thing is not as bad as it seems to be. We have not been a shipping people in the last half century. Until the Civil War, we carried most of our overseas trade in American bottoms; but our merchant marine then gradually declined, until at the beginning of the Great War we carried less than 10 per cent in our own ships. Now we have vessels enough to carry 60 or 70 per cent of our commerce, if business were normal again, and this fleet were in operation.

For my part, I am quite sure that when we get this thing balanced up, dispose of the vessels which are useless, and get the thing organized in a business way again, that if we hope to operate this fleet in the interest of the American people, in the interest of the American manufacturer and farmer, we will have to give some Government assistance to it, despite all we have spent already.

As I see it, when you consider all the elements entering into the cost of building and operating vessels, we can not hope to conduct an American merchant marine under present conditions in competition with Great Britain unless we give some sort of direct or indirect Government aid to them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, in the last two or three weeks we have heard a great deal of talk about the necessity for preparedness in this country and what we lost at the beginning of the war and during the war because we were not prepared. In my judgment, Mr. President, we are paying the cost of unpreparedness now. We were unprepared with a merchant marine when the war opened, which has brought the results we have had pointed out to us to-day. An adequate merchant marine is, in my judgment, just as essential and just as necessary for our national defense in time of war as our battleships or any other part of the Navy, as was suggested by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

So it seems to me that that should be taken into account when we come to consider the requests for appropriations or action necessary for the building up of the merchant marine. It is true that we have appropriated a large sum of money: it is true that we have spent a large sum of money for the building up of our merchant marine. It was considered absolutely necessary at the time. Congress deemed it necessary. We did not have the ships. We had to have them. There was only one way to get them, and that was to build them; and they could not be built without money, and money could not be gotten without appropriations, and so we appropriated the money. The Government built ships not primarily for commercial purposes but to meet the war emergency and the war necessity. As has been suggested, those ships were not constructed as they would have been constructed and as they should have been constructed for purely commercial purposes. They were built in a hurry and, as I said, built to meet that particular emergency.

We are going to lose a whole lot of money; that is, we will not recover a great deal of the money that we spent, but how much money do we ever recover from our naval ships? How much money will we recover of the appropriations that were made for the building of battleships and all that sort of thing? None at all. What aid will those ships be to us in times of peace except as a preparation for war? None at all. Our merchant ships are about the only legacy that came to us from the war that may be of some substantial benefit to us in time of peace. Those ships are not valueless now when the war is over. They will be of tremendous value to the people of the country and the commerce of the country, the wealth and prosperity of the country, in time of peace if properly handled and developed.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Edge] that the past is gone and that much of the criticism which might be made about the past would better be left unsaid. I am satisfied that there was a great deal of incompetency and a great deal of waste in the conduct of governmental affairs during the war. This was true not alone of the building of ships by the Shipping Board but of the other governmental agencies. I am satisfied that there was some corruption in connection with these things, but such things are inevitable in the conduct of war. We can not avoid them and they can not be avoided by pointing them out and criticizing them. I simply accepted them as actually existing and taking place and as past.

We must look to the future if we build up our American merchant marine. As the Senator from New Jersey said, that is what the American people are looking for us to do. They are not looking for us to go back into the past, trying to dig up something wrong or some improvident expenditure or some mistake or even some corruption, but they are expecting us to correct the mistakes and the errors of the past by doing the right and proper thing in the future.

I commend the efforts of the President to secure the proper men for the Shipping Board. I hope we will soon have a rear to the second of the particular

Shipping Board that will take hold of the situation and eradicate the evils that are existent there, that will correct these things, and that will give the people of the country a real, genuine business administration of affairs, and do everything in their power toward the development and maintenance and building up of the American merchant marine, and make it what the people of the country would like to have it be-getting it, as soon as possible and as soon as practicable, consistent with the public welfare, in the hands of private operators and private

It has been said that we have appropriated and spent a great deal of money, and that we have to face a loss for a great deal of the cost of the ships, but there are some things that we are There are some benefits that have come to us overlooking. that apparently we do not take into account.

When the war began we were carrying in our ships only about 9 per cent of our foreign commerce. In April last we carried 37 per cent of our imports in American ships and 40 per cent of our exports in American ships. That means a great deal. I am not going into details with reference to it at this time. It is a matter of saving millions to our own people, of preserving and developing the markets for our own people, and all that sort of thing, as well as the employment of our own labor, our own seamen, and our own captains. In other words, we are to-day with this fleet of ours, under the adverse conditions that confront us, carrying four times as much of our foreign commerce as our ships carried at the outbreak of the war.

The Senator from New Jersey was mistaken, I think, in his idea that what we are appropriating for in the pending bill is to take care of deficits. That is hardly correct. What we are appropriating for in the bill is, first, to take care of the construction cost of completed ships that it has been deemed wiser to complete than to cancel the contracts, because it must not be forgotten that those ships were under contract, and that if the contracts were broken by the Government the contractors have their claims and have to be compensated for damages, and so forth. This was all taken into account, and it was decided wiser to complete the ships than to abandon the contracts and pay the damages. Sixty-one million dollars of the money to be appropriated in the bill is to complete those contracts; in other words, to carry on the construction of the ships.

Of course, it may be said, Why complete the ships that we can not use? This must be considered, that the ships that are on the ways when completed will be about the best ships we will have. As the Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher] said, the present conditions in the business world are not going to continue indefinitely. They may continue for some little time, but they will get better. Demands for shipping transportation will be greater when the trade and business between our country and the other countries of the world are developed, as they must develop when the world begins to recover from the tremendous catastrophe through which we have passed. Then will the demand for ships increase; then will they become profitable-I hope and I believe they will-and then those ships will be among the best of our fleet and will be of great benefit to our people and our merchant marine.

I think the expenditure of the money under the circumstances is fully justified. It may have been wiser to have canceled the contracts when the armistice was signed, but that is in the past. They were not canceled, and I do not blame the men who were in authority because they did not cancel them. I know the consideration that they gave to those matters. I had occasion to appear before them with reference to many of those things, and I know that they gave these subjects very careful consideration. I believe that they acted patriotically and for what they believed to be the best interest of the country when they said that certain contracts shall be canceled and certain other contracts shall be carried out. As I said a while ago, our hind-sight is much better than our foresight. They acted according to their best judgment upon the situation that then confronted them. I believe that events will show in the future that they acted wisely and that in the end we will get back the money we are expending for the completion of those contracts.

The other part of the appropriation, which will add largely to the increase of $50,000,000, is for several different purposes. There are claims for millions of dollars pending before the Shipping Board. Many of them have already been practically adjusted and they have determined the just amounts that are due. These are honest, valid claims of business men who entered into the enterprises at the request of the Government in the emergency that confronted us and they are entitled to consideration. Their claims should be settled as soon as they can agree upon what is due. So far as the Government is concerned, it can settle many of those claims upon a far better basis to itself now than if it forces those men to go into the Court of Claims or into the courts for a final adjudication. We know how it is in a business transaction, especially if a man is confronted with business needs that he feels he must meet or go into bankruptcy, that he will settle a claim for cash at a much lower basis than he would settle for if forced into the courts and to a final adjudication there.

Admiral Benson estimated in his testimony that there are $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 that is actually due to claimants growing out of contracts in connection with shipping that the Government can settle and adjust, if permitted to do it and if it had the money to pay what it finally agrees should be paid, upon a much lower basis than if the claimants are forced to go into court. A good part of this money is included here for the purpose of enabling the Government to adjust those claims upon what it considers a fair and just basis.

Of course, if the Government and the representatives of the claimant can not agree upon what is a fair and just settlement then they will have to go into the Court of Claims. Senator referred to one claim where he said there were some differences of opinion as to the principles that should be carried out in settlement of the claims, and stated that he believed that if those parties went into court they would probably recover from the Government four or five million dollars, but that the claim could be settled just as satisfactorily, if the Government was in position to pay whatever they finally agreed to pay, for about $3,000,000. I do not myself believe in the Government using its power to compel its citizens to take less than is justly due them upon their claims, but I do recognize that those things can be handled in a businesslike way in a spirit of adjustment and compromise, and that claimants will be glad to accept a cash payment of a much lower amount than probably they think they are justly entitled to, according to the best principles that they think should be applied. A part of this appropriation is to enable the Shipping Board to adjust these matters in that Way

The other part is to take care, of course, of possible deficits in operating the ships until the present business depression is tided over. Admiral Benson places the responsibility squarely upon Congress. It is up to us to say whether we will do what is necessary to maintain our ships in carrying the commerce that they ought to carry during this period. Admiral Benson came before the committee and said:

If you do not make this appropriation, our ships will have to stop running, because now they are not paying their operating expenses, taking them as a whole. Some ships are paying expenses. Some routes are paying expenses. The great majority, however, at the present time are not doing it.

The Senator from Florida said they are confronted with the same situation that confronts private owners. Some private ships have been tied up. Other ships are being run at a loss, the losses paid from the profits made by those shipowners during the war when they did make enormous profits. Remember this, that $185,000,000 put into the construction of our ships came out of the profits on our ships that had been completed. To-day when our ships are meeting with adversity, is it for us to say that they have to run and pay their expenses out of their own receipts or that they must be laid up, tied up even in our ports, tied up even in ports across the sea, because they have not the money to pay the seamen or to pay whatever charges accrue against them there?

There is the proposition that Admiral Benson put up to the committee. The committee felt that it could discharge this responsibility only by providing what was considered necessary to keep these ships running. I am glad to see that, while recognizing the unfortunate situation, the sentiment of the Senate is that we shall discharge this responsibility, that we shall provide the money, that we shall keep these ships going, and provide for our commerce until it is demonstrated that we can not maintain a merchant marine.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Ladd in the chair). the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. The ships under the control of the Shipping Board are not the only ships that are now being operated at a loss, are they?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not at all. I have just said that many of the private owners had tied up some of their ships; they are running their ships at a loss, and are making up the loss out of the profits that they made during the war.

Mr. SIMMONS. Ships that are under other flags, as well as those which are under the American flag, are losing money?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly. The best information I can get—I can not get absolute information, of course—is that of the British shipping, six or seven or eight hundred ships are to-day tied up. The situation that confronts us in the shipping world is just like the situation that confronts business in various lines at different times. Agriculture has its periods of depression; it is suffering a period of depression now; and yet, because of that depression, will anybody urge that we should abandon agriculture? Not at all. We want to encourage the farmers and help them keep on until better times come, as better times will surely come. A man who is running a store when business depression comes in the commercial world does not close his store unless he is forced to do so. He will run it at a loss and tide over the depression, if possible; and many of them do so. That is what we have got to do with our shipping.

Mr. President, just a word further. Things have been practically drifting for a year with the Shipping Board. It is no wonder that it is in a chaotic condition; it is no wonder that Senators can find things that are bad and distressing there. We can not expect men to do the best and to do the right thing in many cases under such conditions as have been confronting the Shipping Board. As a matter of fact, we have not had any Shipping Board for a year. The merchant marine act was passed on June 5, 1920, and we have not yet a Shipping Board.

What I want to see is a good Shipping Board appointed. Then I want to see them get down to business and carry out the law which Congress has passed. Wherever they may find that it is deficient let them recommend to Congress the change that should be made and Congress will make it. Let the Shipping Board keep its eye firmly upon the purposes declared in that act to be accomplished, and then, Mr. President, instead of trying to find prohibitions against doing the things that ought to be done let them look with a friendly eye within the purpose of that act for authority to do the things that ought to be done. In my judgment they will find authority in that act to do practically everything that they may deem necessary to be done in order to carry on this great enterprise and to build up the merchant marine. I have seen many objections raised and many suggestions made that this authority should be given or that authority should be given, when, as a matter of fact, the authority is contained in the terms of the law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President-

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In some testimony recently given by the president of the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. before the Committee on Interstate Commerce a criticism was made of the practices of the Shipping Board in the employment of agents under contract for running their vessels. I should like to direct the attention of the Senator from Washington to that matter and to read from that testimony three or four lines descriptive of the practice of the Shipping Board as testified to by Mr. Kruttschnitt. He speaks of the system as being very wasteful, and I remember that his criticism is in agreement with the criticism made by a former member of the Shipping Board and presented to the Senate by the distinguished chair-man of the Committee on Commerce. Mr. Kruttschnitt in his testimony says:

The practice of the Shipping Board is to turn these vessels over to agents to operate them at the expense of the Shipping Board, who receive for their service 5 per cent of the gross receipts. They are relieved of obligations to show any net return, to pay overhead expenses, or a return on the property investment; so that all incentives to conservative rate making and efficiency of management are absent. The agents' compensation is in no wise affected by rising costs, increased operating expenses, or losses. Their whole aim is to increase gross earnings, as thereby they increase their profits. Indeed, the terms of the contract, as may be well understood, encourage extravagance and waste.

Mr. President, I am informed-and I believe on reliable authority-that the policy described here has been very rigidly adhered to by the Shipping Board and is the policy which prevails at this time; that it would have been possible for the Shipping Board to have chartered these vessels under contracts or charters which would have insured a return upon their operation; indeed, I have been informed that the Shipping Board has refused the applications of shippers to charter as many as 50 or 60 vessels at one time and have strictly adhered to the policy of turning these vessels over to agents under the system which Mr. Kruttschnitt criticizes.

In that connection, if I am not overtaxing the patience of the Senator, I should like to call his attention to the statement of Mr. Joseph N. Teal, a member of the board, which the Senator will well remember, because he presented it to the Senate, and to read a paragraph from it descriptive of the system to which I have referred. Mr. Teal says:

General cargo carriers are operated under what is termed the M. O. 4 agreement, adopted October 16, 1920, and made retroactive to March 1, 1920. Under this agreement the operator is appointed and termed "the agent." His duties are to manage, operate, and conduct the business of such vessels as may be assigned to him by the Shipping Board, acting for the United States, the board being represented by the Emergency Fleet Corporation. The agent is to man, equip, supply, and pay for accounts of the corporation the cost thereof, and all other costs and expenses incident to management and operation and generally look after the business, care for, and manage the vessels assigned to him for operation.

As compensation for services rendered the agent receives a commission of from 2½ to 5 per cent on gross receipts from freight and certain other revenues. Generally the compensation is 10 per cent on gross passenger and excess-baggage revenue. Provision is made for per diem compensation under certain conditions named in the contract and for 2½ to 5 per cent of salvage earned. The foregoing is substantially the compensation provided for in the contract.

The agent's compensation is not affected by additional cost, increased expense, or loss. His percentage is based on the gross earnings, and to the extent that he increases the gross he increases his profit. Having no interest in keeping down expenses there is no incentive for the agent to make any particular effort to economize. Indeed, the terms of the contract tend to encourage extravagance—and worse. Practices have been uncovered in several instances where, through controlled companies, having to do with furnishing ship supplies, loading and discharging, etc., expenses have been unduly and improperly increased. While every effort is made to watch expenditures, doing its best, the board is at a great disadvantage.

Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he knowsand I can think of no Member of the Senate who would have a wider or more accurate knowledge on the subject-whether this appropriation will be expended in continuing the same practices which Mr. Teal, a member of the board, criticized, and which on their very face, it seems to me, open the way to a most wasteful expenditure of the public money

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say I hope not. The mat-ter referred to will have to be dealt with by the new Shipping Board, and they will deal with that situation and get rid of it, for, as a general policy, it seems to me there is no way of defending it. It is very much like the cost-plus contracts about which we heard so much during the war, and does, as Mr. Teal says, encourage waste and extravagance, if not something worse. It is one of the problems the Shipping Board must deal with. The success or failure of the law and of the merchant marine depends upon the Shipping Board. If it does not take the right action, things will go wrong; if it tries to do the right thing and does reasonably the right thing, practices like that to which the Senator from Wisconsin has referred will be done away with; but that is the only way it can be done.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is not one of the minor things. Mr. JONES of Washington. I appreciate that it is a very important matter.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is the broad working policy upon which the whole business has been conducted, as I understand. Mr. JONES of Washington. It is tremendously important, and I can not see any justification for it as a general policy. Of course, I can conceive that in some particular instance, in some particular trade it would be wise to encourage the running of ships in that trade for a time by a system such as has been referred to; but, as a general policy, I can not see anything to defend it. I know that prior to the passage of the act of 1920 the Shipping Board itself recognized this situation and was trying to work out contracts under which our ships could be handled that would furnish an incentive to the operator of the ship to run it economically, not only for himself but for the Government. At one time I understood the board had such a contract worked out. I know Chairman Payne told me they had practically worked out a new contract, a new policy; but some new members of the board were appointed and took their places, and apparently as soon as a new man comes in they have got to overturn everything that has been done theretofore and try to do something new. I heard of one contract for the operation of ships being practically completed, and then in a short time I understood that that had all been turned over and they were trying to get up another. So things went on until finally we had no board, and the policy was continued. I hope that will be one of the practices to be done away with by the new board.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President-

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield. Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was curious to know, if the Senator from Washington could tell us, what the conditions were that ever prompted the adoption of such a policy, and particularly, if there was some peculiar condition that prompted it, what reasons are urged for its continuance, as against the policy of chartering the vessels at a figure that will make some return to the Government?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I did not sit with the Shipping Board in its study and work over this matter. The board spent a whole lot of time in its consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will say to the Senator that I can very readily understand that if they desired to start up a trade with certain localities, and no one was willing to charter a ship for that trade, and it seemed desirable to promote that trade, a policy of this kind might be instituted; but as soon as some one comes along who is willing to charter a ship for the trade it seems to me there would be no longer any justification in their continuing the policy, and I was curious to know what reason could be advanced for continuing it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think in the first instance it probably grew out of the abnormal conditions that brought such tremendous profits from the operation of ships, and they found that by giving a certain percentage they would get far more return to the Shipping Board than on a purely charter basis. Now, that is a surmise.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is to say, the business being profitable, the board thought it a more advisable policy to get the profits for the Government rather than to let the profits go to the charterer.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And in some way or other the policy was continued.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; and then there were changes on the board, and they could not get it worked out. remember, while things were going on so well, that under this very plan a Government ship made over $800,000 for the Government on one voyage-over $800,000! Why, we made profits on our ships of over $185,000,000, which went into the construc-

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems to have been a fairly commendable policy when business was good, but a questionable one when business is bad.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Probably when business bad they could not make the change; they probably could not get people who wanted to charter vessels then, and in order to keep them running they probably had to offer this induce-

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. DIAL. I should like to ask the Senator if it is true that one reason why the operation of the ships is not more profitable is because there is an unjust and unreasonable law regulating the operation of the ships? I have heard that contention made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. All sorts of claims are made, of course, with reference to our laws, and everything else. Many people have claimed that our navigation laws interfere with the operation of our ships. I think they do to a very great extent; and yet many objections that have been urged have been shown to have been actually taken care of by laws passed by Congress. The Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher], when he was chairman of the Commerce Committee, submitted to the Department of Commerce specific objections that were made by shipping people to our navigation laws, and the department showed that in nearly every case those objections had been taken care of by legislation. I have not any doubt, however, that there are many things in our navigation laws that ought to be corrected; and I want to say to the Senator that after the merchant marine act was passed I urged the Shipping Board to start upon a revision and codification of the navigation laws, with a view to getting a recommendation to send to Congress to correct inequalities and injustices, and all that sort of thing. They assured me that they would start upon that work, and since then they have assured me that the work is going on; and I hope we shall have in the not distant future a codification of our navigation laws proposed to Congress, so that we can remove many of these inequalities and injustices and handicaps, if they exist.

Mr. DIAL. If they exist, I think we ought to correct them, and I hope we shall.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have nothing more to say, except that there is not a more difficult problem which this administration faces than the merchant-marine problem. There is not a more difficult thing to work out than the development of an adequate merchant marine. If the Shipping Board that is appointed can not do it and does not do it, then the American people will despair of a merchant marine. If Congress is not prepared to do what is necessary and pay the cost, then we might as well abandon the sea.

The handicaps that confront us are tremendous. There is not any question about the fact that our competitors want to keep us off the sea. They will do everything they can to keep us off the sea. I do not utter that in criticism. I do not blame them. It is a business proposition with them. It is a matter of self-interest. I simply hope that we shall take a leaf out of their book, and that the American people will back up the President of the United States in his declaration in his message to Congress that we are determined to have an American merchant marine; but, Mr. President, we can not get it by words, by declarations. We have got to pay the price.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber a moment ago. I ask unanimous consent that the action on the amendment be reconsidered, so that I may offer an amendment to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the reconsideration? The Chair hears none, and it is reconsidered.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The Reading Clerk. On page 82, line 5, after the numerals "1922" and before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided further, That the Fleet Corporation is hereby directed to sell at private sale or public auction before October 1, 1921, all wooden ships not otherwise disposed of, constructed by it or under its direction, or by or under the direction of the United States Shipping Board.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that the law already provides for that, but I am not going to object to the amendment. I think perhaps it may do good in speeding up the work; at least, I hope it may.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not see anything improper about that amendment. As the chairman says, I am satisfied that the board have this authority now; I do not think there can be any question about it; but apparently they do not see fit to exercise it. So far as the wooden ships are concerned, everybody concedes that they are really a liability instead of any possible asset, and I see no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I certainly shall not object to the amendment; but I simply want to say that if the information I have received is correct, the Shipping Board has been trying for the last two years to sell the 6 miles of wooden ships down here in the James River. I understand that they offered the whole bunch of them, two hundred and thirty-odd vessels, for $100,000, and they could not get it. cut down to $40,000, so I have been told, and they could not get it. If anything comes from this, well and good; but I do know that they have been trying to dispose of the ships, if my information is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, have the wooden ships out in Washington and on the Pacific coast been sold?

Mr. SMOOT. No; they are in the same situation with the

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, just a word in reference to the amendment. This applies only to the wooden ships, which it is conceded are of no value to the Government and can not be sold for operation. I am very frank to say that under this amendment they will be sold as junk, but by getting rid of them the Government will save from thirty to forty thousand dollars a month in taking care of them. That is where the dollars a month in taking care of them. That is where the advantage to the Government will lie in the adoption of this amendment. As to their having authority to sell, I am inclined to agree with the chairman; but, whether or not they have authority at present, the fact is that they are not selling them, and this amendment will result in their disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 82, after line 5, to insert: DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Passport bureaus: For salaries and expenses of maintenance of passport bureaus, fiscal year 1922, as follows:
At New York, N. Y., $20,820.
At San Francisco, Calif., $7,500.
At Chicago, Ill., $17,500.
At Seattle, Wash., $4,500.
At New Orleans, La., $7,500, In all, $57,820.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, in order that the Senate and the House may have the benefit of his views on this subject, I offer and ask to have printed in the Record a letter addressed to me by the Secretary of State.

Mr. WARREN. It applies to this amendment, does it? Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, Without objection, it is so

Mr. WARREN. Let the letter come in at the conclusion of the consideration of all amendments under this head.

The lefter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 20, 1921.

The Hon. Samuel M. Shorthdge, United States Schate

United States Scnate.

SIR: In response to your secretary's recent oral request for information relative to the desirability of securing appropriations for the continuance of the passport bureaus at New York and San Francisco, with the possible establishment of additional bureaus at other important centers, I am now pleased to inform you that estimates for this purpose have been forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury for transmission to the Congress.

In order that you may properly judge of the relative cost of maintenance, as compared with the revenue of these bureaus, your attention is directed to the following tabulation, which shows the estimated number of applications to be taken and the cost of maintenance of each bureau. Perhaps the most striking feature in this connection, as you will observe, is the fact that the fees derived from the taking of passport applications at all of the bureaus would amount to as much as or more than their cost of maintenance. In other words, they may be considered as self-sustaining.

Location of bureau.	Number of applica- tions (at $1 each).	Cost.
New York San Francisco Chicago Seattle. New Orleans	41, 094 5, 109 5, 600 1, 200 5, 000	$20,820 7,500 17,500 4,500 7,500

The figures given for the number of applications executed at New York and San Francisco are based upon receipts from those offices during the past year. The figures given for Chicago are believed to be accurate within 100 or 200. The figures for Scattle and New Orleans are estimates. When the New York office was established it handled only about 50 to 75 cases a day. The office now normally executes 150 applications per day. At the present time the number is running over 200 daily. In the year following the establishment of the agency at San Francisco the number of applications increased about 100 per cent. There is, therefore, no reason to doubt that the receipts from the cities in which agencies are proposed will materially increase above the present average receipts from those cities. If the bureaus now established in New York and San Francisco are abolished, the major portion of the fees received through those offices will be lost to the Government, the reason for this being that the taking of applications for passports would devolve to a considerable degree upon clerks of State courts, who retain the fees for executing applications for passports would devolve to a considerable degree upon clerks of State courts, who retain the fees for executing applications for passports.

It may be remarked that no provision has been made for a bureau at Key West, Fla., as the Cuban Legation has informed this department that no passports are now required for Americans entering Cuba from the United States.

You are aware of the great convenience to the public afforded by these agencies where timely information regarding the requirements of foreign Governments is given out by specialized officials, and where it is possible to assemble all essential documents relating to the proof of nationality and the right of the applicant to possess an American passport. Confusion and the loss of time are the inevitable result of intrusting such work to the clerks of courts, who are not specialized on the subject and from whom applicati

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 82, after line 14, to insert:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

Undersecretary of the Treasury, to be nominated by the President and appointed by him, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive compensation at the rate of $10,000 per annum and shall perform such duties in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury as may be prescribed by the Secretary or by law, and under the provisions of section 177, Revised Statutes, in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall perform the duties of the Secretary until a successor is appointed or such absence or sickness shall cease, fiscal year 1922, $10,000.

For the salaries of officers and employees during the fiscal year 1922 at annual rates as follows (now being paid from the appropriation "Expenses of loans"):

Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits, $6,000;
Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits, $6,000;
Division of Deposits: Chief of division, $3,500; assistant chief of division, $2,500; clerks—1 $2,250, 1 $2,000, 1 $1,800, 1 $1,600, 1 $1,400; messenger, $840; assistant messenger, $720; in all, $16,610;
Division of Printing and Stationery: Clerks—1 $1,400, 1 $1,200, 1 $1,000; skilled laborer, $840; 4 laborers, at $720 each; 2 messenger boys, at $480 each; in all, $11,380;

Division of Mail and Files: Distributing clerk, $1,400; reading and routing clerk, $1,400; assistant file clerk, $1,100; assistant mail messenger, $900; in all, $4,800;

Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants: For the force to be transferred to this division on account of the transfer of duties from the Division of Public Moneys, at annual rates of compensation during the fiscal year 1922, as follows: Assistant rates of division, $2,500, clerks—2 at $2,000 each, 3 at $1,800 each, 3 at $1,600 each, 2 at $1,400 each, 2 at $1,200 each, 2 at

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the other day there was some discussion about this amendment. At the time the Senator from Utah stated that, as he understood it, it did not involve any new appropriation, but was a transfer from the appropria-tion under the head "Expenses of loans" made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. In that bill there was appropriated for the next fiscal year, under the head of "Expenses of loans," $3,750,000. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether there is any reason why these items should not be payable from that appropriation? I am not suggesting now anything except to make them payable out of that appropriation of $3,750,000.

Mr. WARREN. They are payable, of course, out of any sum that is appropriated for the purpose.

Mr. LENROOT. This makes a new appropriation.
Mr. WARREN. They are now being paid from the appropriation "Expenses of loans."

Mr. LENROOT. This says "now being paid," but they will not hereafter be paid, under this language, out of that appro-

Mr. WARREN. They should be paid under the new appropriation. If the Senator is talking about an amendment, I have not seen the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I was going to suggest to strike out "now being paid" and to insert "payable."

Mr. SMOOT. I see no objection to that; but the explanation is that there is little difference in the salaries from those provided in the law.

Mr. LENROOT. I am not raising any question about that, Mr. SMOOT. I see no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. You can not say "payable from the appropriation 'Expenses of loans,'" and so forth. I am inclined to think the effect of that would be to leave these men unpaid, But if the Senator insists upon the amendment we can get more information in conference about it.

Mr. LENROOT. I feel very clear that it would make it payable out of this appropriation instead of out of a new one. offer the amendment to the amendment on line 4, page 83, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The Reading Clerk. On page 83, line 4, strike out the parentheses and also the words "now being paid," and insert the word "payable," so as to read:

For the salaries of officers and employees during the fiscal year 1922 at annual rates as follows, payable from the appropriation "Expenses of loans."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, after line 8, to insert:

OFFICE OF THE COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY.

For salaries, fiscal year 1922, at annual rates of compensation as follows: Clerks—4 at $2,000 each, 4 at $1,800 each, 4 at $1,600 each, 5 at $1,400 each; clerk-counters—2 at $1,400 each, 4 at $1,200 each; 2 messengers at $840 each; in all, $37,880.

For compensation, in addition to that carried therefor in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922, as follows: Deputy comptroller, $500; deputy comptroller, $500; chief clerk, $500; in all, $1,500.

For expenses of Federal reserve and national currency (to be reimbursed by the Federal reserve and national banks): For additional employees during the fiscal year 1922 at annual rates of compensation as follows: Clerk-counters—3 at $1,400 each, 3 at $1,200 each; 7 counters at $1,000 each; in all, $14,800.

The Comptroller of the Currency may designate a national bank examiner to act as chief of the examining division in his office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 80, to insert:

OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The unencumbered balances in the appropriations for compensation of employees to audit the accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service in the fiscal years 1920 and 1921 are reappropriated and made available during the fiscal year 1922. And not exceeding $975 per annum may be expended out of the appropriation for contingent and miscellaneous expenses for rental of telephones in the fiscal years 1921 and 1922.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 86, after line 9, to insert:

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

The third provise of the paragraph making appropriations for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, as contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922, is hereby amended to read as follows: "Provided further, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum except the following: Three at not exceeding $7,500 each, 9 at not exceeding $5,000 each, 28 at not exceeding $4,500 each, 36 at not exceeding $3,000 each, 42 at not exceeding $3,500 each, 49 at not exceeding $3,000 each, 68 at not exceeding $2,500 each, and 215 at not exceeding $2,000 each."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, when this matter came up yesterday afternoon I did not have information as to the exact facts, but I have it now, and I wish to give it to the Senate.

The proviso on page 86, lines 15 to 23, inclusive, is a substitute for this proviso in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act which was approved on March 3, 1921:

Provided further. That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum except the following: Three at not exceeding $7,500 each, 5 at not exceeding $5,000 each, 16 at not exceeding $4,500 each, 20 at not exceeding $4,000 each, 16 at not exceeding $3,500 each, 26 at not exceeding $3,000 each, 30 at not exceeding $2,500 each, and 150 at not exceeding $2,000 each.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that that was approved on March 3, 1921, just 90 days ago. Now I read, along with that proviso, which is the present law, the modification provided in this bill:

Provided further, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum except the following: Three at not exceeding $7,500 each, 9 at not exceeding $5,000 each, 28 at not exceeding $4,500 each, 36 at not exceeding $4,000 each, 42 at not exceeding $3,500 each, 49 at not exceeding $3,000 each, 68 at not exceeding $2,000 each, 68 at not exceeding $2,000 each.

I call the attention of the Senate to the further fact that the difference between the two provisos, or the difference between the law as it is and as it will be amended when this is adopted, as it will be adopted, is to increase the salaries of the following employees

Four at $5,000 each, an increase of $3,200 each, or a total increase of $12,800

Twelve at $4,500 each, an increase of $2,700 each, or a total increase of $32,400;

Sixteen at $4,000 each, an increase of $2,200 each, or a total increase of $35,200:

Thirty-two at $3,500 each, an increase of $1,700 each, or a total increase of $54,400:

Twenty-three at $3,000 each, an increase of $1,200 each, or a total increase of $27,600:

Thirty-eight at $2,500 each, an increase of $700 each, or a total increase of $26,600;

Sixty-five at $2,000 each, an increase of $200 each, or a total increase of $13,000;

Making a total increase of salary for these specific employees, 190 of them, of $199,000.

The comment that was made yesterday was that these salaries come out of a lump-sum appropriation of $6,000,000 in the bill approved on March 3, and the Senator from Utah told us, and there is no doubt about it being correct, that they are separating some of them from the service. But you are fixing in this law 190 places for all time, at an increase of $199,000 a year after this year. And permit me to say that the present employees in the War Risk Bureau are drawing war salaries. I do not believe that anybody can say that during the war the employees of the War Risk Bureau, or any other bureau in the city of Washington as a general thing, have not received fair compensation. They have received war compensation. They are receiving war compensation now. Yet, under the terms of this amendment these 190 employees will receive $199,000 out of this lump-sum appropriation this year, which they would not receive but for this amendment. Next year, of course, we will have to appropriate $199,000 again for this purpose.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to remind him that these are not statutory places, and never have been, because we appropriate a lump sum for them, and tell them how they can divide it:

Mr. McKELLAR. I know, but why separate the little fellows from their positions and use the money to increase the salaries of the higher-ups, who already get good war salaries? If there is any economy in that, if that is the idea of economy in this body, I am frank to say that I am unable to understand economy.

It is true, as was stated here yesterday, that this increase of salaries is paid out of money that is already appropriated, the $6,000,000. It is true we have already appropriated the $6,000,-000. Ninety days ago we thought the salaries were high enough, and we thought the appropriation then made would be ample, and hoped we might save some, but if we are going to increase the salaries of the men who are left there, I do not see that there will be much use cutting them off.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say just a word in connection with this provision.

In the first place, this applies only for the year. It is not, as the Senator stated, for all time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just want to ask the Senator if it is possible that if we fix the salaries of these 190 employees this year we will take the increases away from them next year? If so, why are we raising the salaries this year? Everything is going down now. All the products of the farm and industry are going down. Foodstuffs are going down. Why increase the salaries for just one year?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we are in hopes that we will not require the services of all of them the coming year. not say whether they will all be dispensed with or not, but we hope that a great part of them will be. There is an increased pay for 184 clerks at $500, which makes but $92,000; that is all that could be involved if every single cent were paid over and above what was provided for in the legislative bill when that was enacted into law. But the new director thinks that if we increase these salaries he will be able to dispense with a large number of clerks, and I may say that they have been dispensing with many during the month of May.

Mr. President, this is supposed to save money for the Government in the end. I can not say whether the director is going to do what he promised the committee he would do or not, but I certainly expect him to do it, and I certainly hope he will; and I really have confidence that he is going to do it, I will say to the Senator from Tennessee. The fact that we appropriate for one year does not mean that it is going to be repeated.

I can say to the Senator that we had appropriations a year ago in the War Department in which the same kind of provision was made, and this coming year there will not be one of them employed because of the fact that the work has been completed and we have not had to appropriate for those employees for the coming year. I hope to see the greater part of hese employees not appropriated for when the next appropriation bill comes before us, because I think more than likely the work they are wanted for will be such that they will not be required after the end of the first of the year.

Let me tell the Senator another thing. At the beginning of the month of May there were 90,000 applications from soldiers unacted upon in the War Risk Bureau, making claims for disabiilties and for allowances. They had piled up in the department there until there were 90,000 at the beginning of the month of May

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that is the case-and I do not doubt the Senator's statement-then is it not an unwise thing to cut off or reduce the number of employees we have there now and increase the salaries of 190 of them to the extent of $199,000? Could we not use that $199,000 better by keeping some of these experienced employees there to do the work?

Mr. SMOOT. That is just what the amendment does, I will say to the Senator. The employees who are being discharged from the War Risk Bureau now are in other divisions. division that is being provided for is away behind in its work, but there are other divisions in the War Risk Bureau that have more employees than they ought to have. It is for the purpose of getting the right class of men there to do the work that we are making this appropriation for the one year. I know if the Senator from Tennessee understood it he would never object to it for a minute.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator ought to get a pretty good class of employees at the salaries that are to be increased, ranging all the way from $2,000 up to that of a United States Senator. You ought to get a very excellent class of employees for those salaries.

I will say this to the Senator, that if he can add this $199,000 to these 190 employees he will not get any better service from those men next year than he had last year, or practically the same. Why do I say that? It is because we all know that clerical salaries that were being paid during the war were so much better than they could go outside and get that they would stay there and hold on to those salaries as long as they can. My question is, Why raise salaries now? Every business institution in the country is reducing salaries or wants to reduce them, yet it is proposed to come here in a Government departand appropriate additional money, in the first place, for additional employees at this time in a sum in excess of $300,000, and then add $199,000 to that for increases, in all, about half a million dollars added to the taxes that the American people ave to pay. It seems to me it is going a little too far.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not wish to say anything further than this:

It takes a first-class man to pass upon these applications that come from all sections of the country. When a decision is reached it means, in many cases, that the Government of the United States will be called upon to pay $100 a month to the applicant as long as he lives. It is impossible to get a man at $1,500 or $1,600 a year to do that kind of work in a proper way. I know the Senator from Tennessee would not leave it in the hands of that kind of an employee. What we desire to do is to get some men there who have had experience and know something about the question of insurance, the kind of policies that are carried in all sorts of insurance companies, the allowances that are made, what degree of disability there is, and so forth. We can not have every Tom, Dick, and Harry passing upon questions of that importance.

When the bill passes I hope that the 90,000 applications not now acted on or that were not acted on on the 1st day of May will begin to be reduced very rapidly indeed. I understand they will be reduced 10,000 during the month of June and then in July will follow a still further reduction. If a soldier is entitled to compensation for disability of any kind his application ought to be acted upon and he ought to get whatever compensation he is entitled to at as early a date as possible.

Mr. McKELLAR. As a member of the committee, has it been represented to the Senator from Utah or to the committee that any of the 190 employees who are provided with increased salaries in the bill have notified the Government that they will not continue in the service at their present salaries?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think one of them has done so; but there are others who will have to be advanced or secured from

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not so understand it. I had understood the idea is to get rid of the present civil-service employees and get others in.

Mr. SMOOT Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understood the Senator from Wyoming yesterday when I asked the question whether or not that would be done, he said no; that the men now in the department would be retained there.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator asked if these were under the civil service and the Senator from Wyoming answered yes.

Mr. WARREN. I said yes, so far as the law provided that they should be

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator mean that they are going to discharge the present employees?

Mr. SMOOT. No; we are not going to discharge men there who can do the work, not a single one of them; but we are going to have some more men who can do the work in the way in which it ought to be done until we get these applications acted upon

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is going outside of the civil service?

Mr. SMOOT. Not necessarily.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just want to find out what the pur-

Mr. SMOOT. It is not necessary to go outside of the civil

Mr. McKELLAR. Then you are going into other departments and induce clerks there, by reason of the larger salaries to be paid in this department, to come into this department? I just desire to know what the Senator's purpose is.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is no man in any other department who can do this work who is not already receiving a salary equal to what these salaries will be. These salaries are not changing existing law.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know that. Mr. SMOOT. That is all there is to it. We have to have the increase in numbers if we are going to get the applications acted on. So far as I am personally concerned the applications are going to be acted upon just as quickly as possible.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to get the correct information. I do not know about it, and I am in the dark about it at present. Here are 190 employees, and by this bill the bureau is authorized to give 190 employees or additional employees to that number these salaries of $5,000, $4,500, $4,000, $3,500, $3,000, $2,500, and $2,000. As I said yesterday, the idea is to increase the salaries of those 190 employees so as to get better service. To-day the Senator has said, as I understand him, that the idea is to go out somewhere else and bring in other employees.

Mr. SMOOT. If they can not get them within the department. Let me say to the Senator that we may have, for instance, an employee in one of the other divisions of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. Suppose he is drawing $1,800, and he can do the work that is being done by an employee of this particular division who is getting $2,000. The Senator does not think the man taken from the other division, now getting $1,800, should come in and at that same salary do the work for which other employees are receiving $2,000?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think so. Mr. SMOOT. More than likely, I will say to the Senator, about all of the increases will be made in that way. They will be promotions of men who have demonstrated to the Director of the War Risk Bureau that they are capable of properly doing the work, because they have done good work in the past, because of the experience they have had which enables them to do this particular work.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps I can get at it in this way. How many of the 190 employees come under the civil service law?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not tell. I think they will all come under the civil service law. There may be some one we will pay who will receive $5,000 who might not come under the civil service law, but in such a case an order would be issued by the President setting the civil-service examination aside, but I doubt if there will be any case of that kind.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are all of the employees under the civil service?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that all the employees of the Government in the District of Columbia, unless it is specifically provided otherwise, come within the civil-service

Mr. McKELLAR. If they come under the civil service law, and the Civil Service Commission is not permitting any new examinations to be held, then the only way an outsider could come in and be employed would be by an Executive order of the President.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understood the Senator, the law blankets them all.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not looked it up, but I think the Senator from Wyoming was perfectly correct in the statement he made.

Mr. McKELLAR. That they were all under the civil service? Mr. SMOOT. Yes. This is the proposition, and the Senator can find out from the Civil Service Commission if he wishes to telephone to them. Wherever there is a provision made for the employment of men or women in the District of Columbia, and there is no specific mention in the law as to whether they shall fall within the civil service law or not, they then come under the civil service act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope that civil-service employees will be put into these positions. The reason why I say that is because it is very remarkable that the Senate and the House have agreed within 90 days as to the number of employees and the salaries they should receive. It is passing strange to one just looking at it that these 190 positions should be created, most of them of very considerable importance, with salaries increased from $1,800 to $5,000. Here are the cases of 190 employees in the War Risk Bureau, and it is such a peculiar situation, and I do not think a good reason has been given for it. But, of course, the Senate is in the hands of our friends on the other side of the aisle, and they have control of legislation, and they can put it in. I do not subscribe to it; I do not think it is necessary to increase the salaries in this remarkable way at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before proceeding further wish to say that I am compelled to leave the Chamber, and I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question before doing so. On yesterday the Senate agreed to a committee amendment, as I understand, appearing on page 38, beginning with line 20. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question about it.

The House text provides for an appropriation of $35,000 "for inquiries and scientific and technological investigations concerning the mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of heavy clay products, cement, feldspar, slate, and other non-metallics," and so forth.

I know that some of the people who are largely engaged in the manufacture of clay products are very much interested in this matter, and I frankly say that I am very much impressed that a very useful service could be rendered by this department or some other department in taking up the investigation of the subject. I think we all realize that the clay manufactured products are being constantly developed, and I regret exceedingly that this provision was stricken out on yesterday. May I inquire if the Senate amendment was agreed to? I wish to know the reason why, if it was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I will state to the Senator that there is no prejudice against the work being done, but there is in the Bureau of Standards an organization of the same kind for the same purpose. The committee have an amendment which will later be proposed to bring it about. If it will help the Senator,

I shall be glad to read that amendment now.

Mr. POMERENE. I would be very glad, because I am compelled to leave the Chamber for a little while.

Mr. WARREN. In order that others may know how it will read, if the amendment is adopted which I have in my hand, I will read it:

For continuation of the investigation of structural materials, such as stone, clays, cement, etc., including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $50,000.

It is proposed then to add the following:

Provided, That as much of this sum as may be necessary shall be used to collect and disseminate such scientific, practical, and statistical information as may be procured showing or tending to show approved methods in building, planning, and construction, standardization and adaptability of structural units, including farm buildings, building materials, and codes, economy in the manufacture and utilization of building materials and supplies, and such other matters as may tend to encourage, improve, and cheapen construction and housing.

I may say that the provision concerning the Bureau of Standards is not new; it is a transfer of an appropriation made for the Census Bureau. In the meantime the Committee on Commerce has had referred to it a bill, and I think it has been reported and is on the calendar, which relates to this matter in some respects. In consultation with the chairman of that committee, and with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], who, as we know, has been greatly interested in the subject, and has at great expense produced much information concerning the building situation, it was concluded that the same object would be covered without allowing the particular sum allowed by the House to the Bureau of Mines. Hence the item was stricken out by action of the committee in its consideration of the subject.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may intrude further, I notice that there is a difference in the phraseology, so far as the materials are concerned in these two paragraphs. Would there be any objection to inserting in the second paragraph the materials which are designated on page 38?

Mr. WARREN. I shall be able to answer the Senator in a moment, as soon as I find the point in the bill to which he refers. Mr. POMERENE. For instance, the clause on page 38 uses the words "feldspar, slate, and other nonmetallics.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Ohio merely wants to add the name of other materials?

Mr. POMERENE. That was the thought. Personally, I am disposed to think that what the chairman of the committee has in mind will cover what is provided for on page 38, but it seems to me if that phraseology was merely transposed it would be proper. I do not know why this authority ought to be given to the Bureau of Mines rather than to the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. WARREN. The investigation is already being conducted by the Bureau of Standards, and I think the Senator from Ohio wants to join other Senators in eradicating duplication so far as we can

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to that; in fact, if it is going to avoid duplication, that, of course, is what we all

Mr. WARREN. That is what we are striving to do. I have no objection to the kind of amendment which the Senator from Ohio proposes to offer; that is, to the clause which he suggests being added to the amendment on page 93.

Mr. POMERENE. If the amendment on page 93 may be so modified as to include all of the materials covered by the provision on page 38, that would meet my thought about it.

Mr. WARREN. If I understand the Senator correctly, he may offer the amendment, and we shall adjust the language afterwards.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the words "and so forth" cover what the Senator from Ohio has in mind.

Mr. POMERENE. I think "and so forth" is a very unfortunate expression. Do I understand that the Senator from Wyoming is not ready to take the matter up now?

Mr. WARREN. Entirely so, in the manner the Senator suggests. We have not passed upon the amendment on page 93, but we did pass upon the amendment on page 38, striking out the House provision; but if it is desired to introduce the new matter, including the articles which the Senator has mentioned. then there will be nothing to do but for him to offer an amendment and have a vote upon it.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator desires to go on with something else, I shall meanwhile try to formulate the amendment so as to make it harmonize with what the chairman intends to

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he merely add "feldspar and slate."

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the Senator from Ohio understands that my statement is merely the word of the chairman of the committee; but I dare say that the Senate will not object, though I think he should ask unanimous consent.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me call the attention of the chairman and other Senators to the language on page 93, where it reads:

For continuation of the investigation of structural materials-

And so forth. On page 38 provision is made for "investigations concerning the mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of heavy clay products, cement, feldspar, slate, and other nonmetallics." Does the chairman of the committee construe Does the chairman of the committee construe the word "investigations" to embrace the subjects of "mining, preparation," and so forth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, I desire to say that I do not think that the proposed amendment is going to meet what he has in mind at all. The Bureau of Standards is making a certain investi-gation here in Washington in reference to clays, stones, and cement for certain purposes.

The Bureau of Mines, out in the field in their experimental stations, are pursuing investigations relating in a way to the same materials, as I understand, but it is a very different investigation, conducted along different lines, from a different angle, with a different objective in view. Of course, to change the language on page 93 might broaden the scope of the provision there, but it is not going to change the investigation that is now in progress by the Bureau of Standards. The elimination of the language on page 38 in reference to the Bureau of Mines is going to take away the money and stop their present work. So, if the Senator will allow me, I do not think the amendment, although he may propose to change the language so as to cover the same subject, will accomplish his object. The work in progress is different, although involving the same materials. The result will be that the change of language will not affect the situation. It will permit the Bureau of Standards to pursue its present investigations of these materials for particular purposes and with the objective they have in mind, which is a different objective from that of the Bureau of Mines, although they are dealing with the same materials.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Alabama if they do not believe that if the provision is left in the bill for the Bureau of Mines the operations of that bureau ought to cease when they get the clay to the top of the ground, and then let the Bureau of Standards, in the Department of Commerce, proceed with the desired investigations?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The investigations of these two bureaus are so different that to adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio would be the same thing as to say, for instance, in the case of flour, one cooking teacher was teaching a class how to make bread and another was teaching a class how to make cake, that one of the classes should stop, and that the one that was making cake should get the information from the teacher who was making bread. Of course, these two investigations relate to the same raw materials; but the Bureau of Standards is conducting, for one purpose, an investigation looking to the use of the materials for construction purposes, while the Bureau of Mines is conducting an investigation for the purpose of developing the facts as to the production of these materials and the future market for their sale.

Mr. CURTIS. That is the point I had in mind. Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are not interlocked.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator will notice, on page 38, line 22, under the heading of the Bureau of Mines the word "utilization" is used. That, of course, covers what is intended by the other amendment. I suggest to the Senator that when the two provisions were being considered in the committee the Secretary of Commerce was asked if he would not consult the Secretary of the Interior and see if they could not work this matter out so there would be no duplication.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not questioning the Senator's suggestion that the two provisions relate to the same materials; but the class of investigation is different. I am not complain-

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him before he proceeds further?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. When the question came up there were two opinions in the committee concerning it. There was no insistence concerning the matter from the Secretary of Commerce and the Director of the Bureau of Standards, Dr. Stratton, both of whom were present; and after we had heard them the proposition was made by a committeeman that we should eliminate the provision on page 38, because they agreed, as the Senator from Kansas has stated, that the question would be taken up with the other department, and they would let us know before our Senate and House conference concerning it. Now, when we consent to the insertion of some additional words in provisions on page 93, I suggest that the other provision should also be left in because it is a House provision, and before the bill gets through conference we are bound to hear whatever report may be made as the result of the consultation referred to, which, in my judgment, will be along the line that the Senator from Alabama has indicated in his remarks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the reason I have not said anything about striking out the House item. The Senate committee have stricken out the House language, and have made the appropriation for the Bureau of Standards. If the House insists on its provision in regard to the Bureau of Mines the matter would still be before the conference committee.

If my colleague from Ohio will pardon me for saying so, thought that he was misinterpreting the question as to whether the language suggested would provide for carrying on the same investigations. I repeat the investigations are entirely separate and distinct.

Mr. POMERENE. I was simply anxious that the investiga-tions be continued. I was not perfectly clear about it, because my attention was only called to the matter late yesterday after-I was going to offer the suggestion, on page 93, line 20, to strike out the words "and so forth," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "feldspar, slate, and other nonmetallics."

If that amendment is adopted, then the question can be taken up in conference between the Senate and the House; they can work out the amendment on page 93 and the amendment on page 38 so that there will be no conflict, and we can get the benefit of any proper appropriation that may be necessary.

Mr. WARREN. My attention was diverted for a moment.

Will the Senator repeat his suggestion?

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest an amendment, on page 93, line 20, to strike out the words "and so forth" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "feldspar, slate, and other nonmetallics." That will authorize the Bureau of Standards to make such investigations as it may be desirable for them to make.

Mr. WARREN. So far as the chairman of the committee is concerned, he accepts the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 93, after line 12, the committee propose to insert the following amendment:

BUREAU OF STANDARDS.

The sum of $250,000 of the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the Bureau of the Census for the fiscal year 1922 is transferred to the Bureau of Standards and made available during that fiscal year for the following purposes and in the following amounts, respectively:

For continuation of the investigation of structural materials, such as stone, clays, cement, and so forth, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $50,000.

For technical investigations in cooperation with the industries upon fundamental problems involved in industrial development following the war, with a view to assisting in the permanent establishment of the new American industries developed during the war, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $100,000.

To enable the Bureau of Standards to cooperate with Government departments, engineers, and manufacturers in the establishment of standards, methods of testing, and inspection of instruments, equipment, tools, and electrical and mechanical devices used in the Industries and by the Government, including the practical specification for quality and performance of such devices, and the formulation of methods of inspection, laboratory, and service tests, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $100,000.

It is proposed to amend the committee amendment on page 93,

It is proposed to amend the committee amendment on page 93, line 20, by striking out the words "and so forth" and inserting the words "feldspar, slate, and other nonmetallics."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I assume that the chairman of the committee intends to offer the other amendments to that paragraph which we had in mind.

Mr. WARREN. In order to accommodate the Senator, as I understand he will shortly be compelled to leave the Chamber, may turn forward in the bill, although there are quite a number of items still unfinished on the intervening pages, as the matter is under consideration, I will follow up the amendment the Senator has offered by the one which I send to the desk, which is a committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The Reading Clerk. On page 93, after line 22, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That as much of this sum as necessary shall be used to collect and disseminate such scientific, practical, and statistical information as may be procured, showing or tending to show approved methods in building, planning, and construction, standardization, and adaptability of structural units, including farm buildings, building materials, and codes, economy in the manufacture and utilization of building materials, and supplies, and such other matters as may tend to encourage, improve, and cheapen construction and housing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 86, after line 23, to insert:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Salt Lake City, Utah, purchase of property: For the purchase of property adjoining the Federal building at Salt Lake City, Utah, fiscal year 1922, $60,000.

Wilmington, N. C., customhouse and appraisers' stores building: The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and empowered to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, certain additional land across the alley which joins the east side or rear of the present site of the customhouse, appraisers' stores, etc., building at Wilmington, N. C., as an addition to said present site, and to pay for such additional land from the unencumbered balance of the appropriations heretofore made for the acquisition of a site and the erection of the customhouse, appraisers' stores, etc., building in said city.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, after line 12, to in-

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

On and after July 1, 1921, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to promulgate such a schedule of fees to be charged vessels at each of the national quarantine stations as will be fair and reasonable for the services rendered by each station: Provided, That this authority shall not be applicable to any quarantine station where the fees are now fixed by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, after line 20, to in-

WAR DEPARTMENT.

Sert:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

Office of the Secretary; For additional amount required for the salary of the Assistant Secretary of War in accordance with section 5a of the act "To amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," iscal year 1922, $5,000.

Barracks and quarters, insular possessions: The unobligated balance of the appropriation for continuing construction of the necessary accommodations for the Seacoast Artillery and for temporary cantonments for overseas garrisons in the Philippine Islands, contained in the fortification appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921, is continued and made available for the same purposes until June 30, 1922. Water system, Schofield Barracks, Hawaii: For installation of a pipe line to replace the present water main from Koolau Reservoir to Schofield Barracks, fiscal year 1922, $600,000.

Engineer Department: The sum of $110,000 of the unexpended amount of the appropriation "Engineer operations in the field, 1919," shall remain upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of this appropriation until June 30, 1922, to permit payments to be made to the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. for searchlight mirrors under its contract therefor dated July 30, 1918.

Quartermaster Corps: To complete the acquisition of land required for the Infantry School at Camp Benning, Ga., there may be expended from the appropriation "General appropriations, Quartermaster Corps," for the fiscal year 1919, the sum of $400,000, which amount shall be in addition to the sum of $515,252, the expenditure of which for the same purpose was authorized by the act approved February 28, 1920, entitled "An act to amend the Army appropriation work at certain military posts, and for other purposes." The said sum of $400,000 herein authorized to be expended shall remain on the books of the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation "General appropriations, Quartermaster Corps, 1919,"

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, right at that point there' should be inserted the amendment as to unexpended balances that was laid over yesterday. It has been read, and is all ready to be agreed to. It need not be read again.

The amendment is as follows:

The amendment is as follows:

On page 89, after line 7, insert the following:

"Unexpended balances: Such amounts of the unexpended balances of the appropriations chargeable with the settlement of claims resulting from the suspension or termination of contracts or other procurement obligations of the War Department, consequent upon the suspension of hostilities, and with the adjustment of claims under the act entitled 'An act to provide relief in cases of confracts connected with he prosecution of the war, and for other purposes,' approved March 2, 1919, shall remain upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of the respective appropriations and be available for similar purposes until June 30, 1922, and said amounts not to exceed $250,000, shall also be available for such personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere as in the discretion of the Secretary of War are necessary to properly protect the interests of the United States in making such settlements and adjustments: Provided, That no part of said amounts shall be used to pay any claims arising out of any contract or other obligation unless such contract or obligation was entered into subsequently to April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 89, after line 7, to insert:

POSTAL SERVICE.

OUT OF THE POSTAL REVENUES.

Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General.

The Post Office Operatment is authorized to settle claims for damages to persons or private property resulting from the operation of aircraft in the Air Mail Service, in amounts of not more than $250, after each such claim shall have been substantiated by an investigation by post-office inspectors and approved by the Postmaster General, and for the payment of such claims there is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year 1922 the sum of $35,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the amendment which has just been read comes to us as a new matter and comes to us as relating to the Air Mail Service, but it calls to the attention of the committee the fact that in the War Department, the Navy Department, and some others we provide that these small damages—not exceeding, say, $500—may be investigated and settled by the departments. Otherwise we have a line of claims that come before the Committee on Claims and before the Appropriations Committee, oftentimes with the feeling on the part of the injured party that we shall cut them down, and consequently the amounts are made larger than if cash settlement were offered immediately. So in the War Department and in the other departments, one at a time, we have provided that they may be settled up to a certain amount and this saves much money. Therefore I am going to send to the desk, in place of that amendment, a more comprehensive amendment which will give the Post Office Department the authority to settle those small claims, up to not exceeding $500 each, after they have been thoroughly examined.

I offer this amendment as a substitute for the one that has just been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In lieu of the committee amendment as printed in the bill, it is proposed to insert the following:

When any damage is done to person or property by or through the operation of the Post Office Department in any branch of its service, and such damage is found by the Postmaster General, upon investigation, to be a proper charge against the United States, the Postmaster General is hereby invested with power to adjust and settle any claim for such damage when his award for such damage in any case does not exceed $500; and the sum of $35,000 is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year 1922 to carry out the provisions of this paragraph.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 89, after line 19, to insert:

For two delegates to the Pan-American Postal Congress, Buenos Aires, Argentina, to be appointed by the Postmaster General from the Post Office Department, to be expended in the discretion of the Postmaster General and to be accounted for on his certificate, which certified the shall be conclusive on the accounting officers of the United States, fiscal year 1922, $5,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to make a point of order against this amendment; but, just for the RECORD, I wish to state that I have been opposed and am now opposed to all kinds of appropriations for this purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that amendment was passed over yesterday because the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. King] was not present; but the last thing before he and I left the Chamber last night I had a conversation with him, in which he stated that he did not know certainly whether he should object to it or not. He is not here, and of course we must finish the bill. I trust that the amendment will be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have here an amendment as a matter of appropriation to carry out a law that has already been passed, but passed too late for its inclusion in the regular line of appropriation, where it properly belongs. It is really a deficiency, therefore, and I send it to the desk. It is authorized

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Reading Clerk. On page 43, after line 25, it is proposed to add the following:

For the purchase, as authorized by law, of not to exceed 20 acres of land occupied by the Department of Agriculture's experiment vineyard near Fresno, Calif., now maintained under contract with the owners of said land, $12,000.

For the purchase, as authorized by law, of not to exceed 20 acres of land occupied by the Department of Agriculture's experiment vineyard near Oakville, Calif., now maintained under contract with the owners of said land, $15,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, what sort of vineyard is this?

Mr. WARREN. The Secretary of Agriculture was authorized to purchase this land. I have here the act on the subject.
Mr. McCORMICK. For what purpose?

WARREN. I will send up the act, so that it may be It is very short. This is a fulfillment of the law. If Mr. WARREN. the Senator wishes to know whether or not it ought to have been done, I shall have to pass that question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A good many people have a good deal of curiosity about these vineyards.

Mr. WARREN. It is undoubtedly to carry on the scientific work of the Agricultural Department, and for that purpose it is necessary to have land there, investigators, and so forth.

The READING CLERK. The act approved March 2, 1921, reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase and acquire the lands occupied by the department's experiment vineyards near Fresno and Oakville, Calif., now maintained under contracts with the owners of said lands: Provided, That the land purchased for the Fresno vineyards shall not exceed 20 acres at a cost not to exceed $12,000 and for the Oakville vineyard not to exceed 20 acres at a cost not to exceed $15,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Reading Clerk. On page 86, after line 23, it is proposed to insert the following-

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President-

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, before the Senator presents his amendment I desire to say that I have looked over the amendment the Senator from Illinois has presented and also a similar one presented by the two Senators from Kentucky. They are undoubtedly necessary to complete those hospitals to take care of the disabled soldiers. It is against every rule of appropriations to offer them in this way, without estimates, and so forth, but I shall not object, as the chairman of the committee, provided the Senators will in each case ask unanimous consent of the Senate, and the Senate will give that consent. They are not in order, of course, upon this bill.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I recognize, as do the Senators from Kentucky, that if objection were made, the amendments would not be in order.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I suggest that the amendments be read to the Senate. We do not know what the amendments are which are being discussed.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let the amendments be read, and then I will proceed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendments for the information of the Senate.

The Reading Clerk. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. Mc-

Cormick] moves to insert, following line 23 on page 86:

CHICAGO, ILL., BROADVIEW HOSPITAL

CHICAGO, ILL., BROADVIEW HOSPITAL.

For recreation building, walks, and roads, water-softening apparatus, additional water supply, planting and improving of grounds, and for superintendence and technical services necessary for said work at customary rates of compensation to be employed within or without the District of Columbia and without regard to civil-service rules and regulations at a limit of cost not to exceed $500,000: Provided, That the expenditures for such superintendence and technical services shall not exceed 3 per cent of the total amount expended hereunder: And provided further, That in carrying the foregoing authorization into effect the Secretary is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to enter into contracts or to employ labor and purchase materials in the open market, all of said work to be performed under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] proposes the following amendment, to follow the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois:

DAWSON SPRINGS (KY.) SANATORIUM.

DAWSON SPRINGS (KY.) SANATORIUM.

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the principal buildings for the Dawson Springs (Ky.) Sanatorium to be erected of fire-proof construction and as originally designed, $750,000, and the limit of cost heretofore fixed for said sanatorium is hereby increased from $1,500,000 to $2,250,000: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act the completion of the buildings and approaches for said sanatorium shall be under the supervision and direction of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, the compensation of the superintendent of construction and such technical and clerical assistance as may be necessarily employed in the superintendence of the completion of said buildings and approaches to be chargeable to the appropriation for the field force of the office of the Supervising Architect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GLASS. I'believe the Senator from Illinois desired to make some statement with respect to the proposed amendment.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I wish to explain that the appropriation for the Broadview Hospital, provided for in my amendment, is based on estimates of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury as necessary principally for the construction of a recreation hall and the planting of the grounds, together with the laying of the necessary walks.

When the Assistant Secretary in charge of the War Risk Insurance and the hospital service examined the Broadview Hospital and grounds he called into conference some architects of standing and a committee of citizens who were interested in the completion of the hospital and the improvement of the grounds as necessary for the comfort of the men, the hospital itself being completed, or substantially completed. The architects and the landscape authorities submitted figures upon which this estimate of $500,000 for the Broadview Hospital is based.

The Public Lands Committee of the House has reported a bill authorizing that this work be done, and authorizing at the same time the work contemplated in the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]; but, of course, unless an appropriation can be made through this bill the work can not go forward now, and there will be delay, and probably long delay, in making the buildings and grounds ready for the use

We should not have offered these amendemnts if we had not deemed it urgent to complete these buildings in order that men who to-day are in private hospitals, and even on county poor farms, may be brought together under one roof directly to be cared for by the Federal Government.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Illinois what assurance he has, if any, that this appropriation will not be exceeded, or that further appropriations for this project will not be asked for?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I have no other assurance than that which the Senators from Kentucky have, the estimate of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury to whom has been confided the responsibility of the care of the men disabled during the war. I have sought no other.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, of course, the Senator knows that this amendment is not in order on the pending bill, and that a point of order would lie against it. I do not know that I shall make the point of order; I am rather undisposed to do it; but I want to say, before the amendment is acted on, that more of mystery has attended this Broadview Hospital at Chicago than has been attached to the mystery of the Man in the Iron Mask or the authorship of the Letters of Junius. Nobody has ever been able to tell the Congress what it all means.

It is an ungracious task, ordinarily, to say, "I told you so," but in view of the fact that there has been a good deal of misdirected, if not malicious, criticism of the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to this hospital, I want to recall the fact that when the original appropriation of $3,000,000 was made the committees of Congress were very definitely and repeatedly assured that not another dollar would be asked for, and when the Secretary of the Treasury, under the statute, undertook to impose the limitations and requirements of the law, he was accused of delaying a necessary structure, and the representation was made that if the Secretary of the Treasury would withdraw his objections, or, more accurately, if the Secretary of the Treasury would proceed contrary to law rather than in compliance with the statute, the building would be completed in 90 days and occupied by soldiers in distress and under disability.

The Secretary of the Treasury had prepared a contract in accordance with the statute, which the owner of this property refused to sign, and a few days thereafter he came to the committees of Congress, through his attorney, and had the appropriation increased from $3,000,000 to $3,400,000. And now I want to bring to the Senate what was said on that occasion,

Mr. McKELLAR. What date was that? Mr. GLASS. March 2, 1920. The then Senator from Colorado, Mr. Thomas, interrupting the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, on March 2, 1920, said:

tions Committee, on March 2, 1920, said;

I wish to ask the Senator whether this additional appropriation of $400,000, making a total of $3,400,000, will represent all the moneys to be invested in this building and grounds? In other words, does the $3,400,000 complete the project?

Mr. Warren. It does.

Mr. Thomas. Will the Government hereafter be compelled to make other appropriations to finish the building?

Mr. Warren. I will say to the Senator that I would not be standing here saying one word about that hospital if the committee had not had that brought in such shape that it is an absolute closure, and the $400,000 is intended more as an insurance than a possible expenditure; but the contract they have agreed to sign, and the only contract which the present Secretary of the Treasury says he will sign, will cover that, so that there can be no contingency whatever on account of God, man, or the elements which shall prevent the completion of the building on the part of the contractors and former owners inside of the $3,400,000, and they will be under heavy bond.

The definite and repeated promise was that if we would make that addition to the appropriation the building would be completed within 90 days and occupied. It is not complete to-day and it will not be completed within the next 90 days and ready for occupancy.

I refer to a prediction I made on that occasion. I said:

I make the prediction here and now that before you shall have gotten a hospital there suitable for the effective care of patients you must appropriate other large sums; and before we shall have a real modern plant we must expend from $1,000,000 to $2,500,000 more.

Mr. Warren. That may be the Senator's opinion. It is not mine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the Senator whether, in the provision now submitted to the Senate, it is provided that no further appropriation shall be made for this particular service?

Mr. Warren. It provides that it shall be finished completely.

Mr. President, I hesitate to make reference to what was said on that occasion, because I am perfectly confident that the chairman of the Appropriations Committee thought he was right and that I was wrong, and I have such great respect for his judgment and such attachment to him personally that I would not want to say a word that would embarrass him now. But I do not like this Broadview Hospital project in any of its The Government should have done what it was adfeatures vised to do at the time—it should have appropriated a sufficient amount of money for an up-to-date, modern hospital, which would have been completed before now and occupied by soldiers in distress. We are not only now called upon to appropriate an additional $500,000, but when that shall have been done we will not have a hospital fit for occupancy. We shall have to expend from half a million to a million dollars additional, or it may be more, to furnish the hospital, and the whole thing has gone on in this unbusinesslike, slipshod way, with the accretions of other appropriations.

As I said, the whole thing has been a mystery from beginning to end, and the chairman of the Appropriations Committee does not now know and can not know, as no Senator can know, what will be the end of it.

I shall not object to the amendment, and I shall not object only because possible delay may involve further distress to disabled soldiers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Mc-CORMICK ].

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is now on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I propose the amendment which I now send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated, The Reading Clerk. On page 29, after line 4, insert under subhead "Judicial":

To pay the widow of Edward Douglass White, recently Chief Justice of the United States, $15,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to say that this is usually done. We have heretofore made similar appropriations the same as we do for families of deceased Senators. I have a particular interest in this amendment, although it is offered by a Member from the floor, because of the long service of the former Senator whose widow this will benefit and for many other reasons.

I first met Chief Justice White on the 27th of May, 1863, 58 years ago, in battle at Port Hudson, where he was on one side of the fortifications and I on the other. He was then a first lieutenant, I a noncommissioned officer. He was but a boy in years, like myself. He was in the service of the Confederate States, I with the Union forces. After the close of the war his services were given to his State or the United States almost without interval.

The next time I met Chief Justice White was here on the floor of the Senate, where he served as a Senator with great distinction. He was appointed from the floor of the Senate to the Supreme Court of the United States by President Cleveland, and considerably later on I with others, especially the Senators from Louisiana, asked the then President of the United States to raise his rank and make him the Chief Justice of the United States, although there was no precedent therefor. He alone enjoyed that remarkable distinction. So, during all his life long his services were given to his State and country. His loyalty and Americanism were never questioned.

With all that long public service and while he may leave some fortune, it is hardly the correct thing for us to do less for his family than we have done for others. Therefore I hope the Senate will unanimously indorse the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Broussard].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which send to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated. The Reading Clerk. On page 90, after line 26, insert: That the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the State agricultural colleges and experiment stations and the United States Council of the World's Poultry Congress and other organizations, be, and he hereby is, authorized on behalf of the United States to make suitable exhibits at the World's Poultry Congress of the International Association of Poultry Instructors and Investigators, to be held at The Hagne, Holland, September 6 to 13, 1921, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for this purpose, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000, fiscal years 1921 and 1922, to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture, under such regulations as he shall prescribe, for the preparation, assembling, transportation, maintenance, and demonstration of the exhibits, which exhibits upon their return to the United States shall be the property of the United States and remain under the control of the Department of Agriculture. And the Secretary of Agriculture is also authorized to select and, out of the appropriation authorized hereunder, defray the expenses of three delegates who are officials or employees of the Department of Agriculture to attend the said congress and of investigating and reporting, in connection with said congress, on poultry conditions and methods of poultry production and marketing.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to say that it breaks my heart to deny the Senator from New York any of the amendments which he has offered from time to time. Furthermore, it breaks whatever I have left of my heart to do anything against the farmers and the farming industry, because my life is that of a farmer. However, we have had so many matters come before the committee for consideration that the committee has instructed me to recognize only those that came in proper order and to insist that the members of the committee should have what they had the right to have—the opportunity to say yea or nay upon any such matters. Therefore I shall be compelled to make a point of order against the proposed amendment, notwithstanding I know the earnestness of the Senator from New York, as well as that of one or two Members of the House from that State. I shall not ask that the point be ruled upon until the Senator has an opportunity to be heard on his amendment.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I understand that the Secretary of Agriculture has written the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations urging that this appropriation be allowed. The amendment provides that the Department of Agriculture in cooperation with our State agricultural colleges shall have an exhibit at the International Poultry Congress. It is something which will be of national interest. There is no politics We produce in this country over a billion dollars worth of poultry products each year. We have encouraged the International Congress and it seems to me at the one time when it is to be held abroad we very properly ought to be represented. I hope the Senator from Wyoming will not insist upon the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. I am very sorry, but I shall have to insist upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained. Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated. The READING CLERK. On page 89, after line 7, insert:

Ogden Arsenal, Utah: Of the $5,000,000 which the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, was authorized in the second deficiency act, approved March 6, 1920, to expend during the fiscal year 1921 for the construction of storage facilities for ammunition and components thereof, $100,000 is hereby made available during the fiscal year 1922 for the development of a water supply for Ogden Arsenal, Utah: Provided, That not to exceed $30,000 of the amount herein made available for this purpose may be expended for the purchase of such land and water rights as may be necessary to provide a suitable water supply for Ogden Arsenal.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that a letter from the Secretary of War be inserted in the RECORD stating the reasons why the amendment ought to be agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Let it be read. Mr. SMOOT. It is not an appropriation that is called for, I will say to the Senator from Wyoming.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be read, as requested.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Senator: The second deficiency act, approved March 6, 1920, authorizes the construction of permanent storage facilities for ammunition and components at Ogden, Utah, and Savanna Proving Ground, and the expenditure during the fiscal year 1921 of $5,000,000 for this purpose, including $96,000 for the purchase of land near Ogden. The construction of the establishment near Ogden. Utah, known as Ogden Arsenal, is nearly completed, with the exception of the development of a water supply. The original plans for this arsenal contemplated the drilling of a deep well on the reservation and the installation of necessary pumps and equipment.

A thorough investigation, which has just been concluded, has developed the fact that a deep well which would cost about $65,000 might strike only salt water or might possibly be dry. On the other hand, there is a spring which would provide an excellent, adequate, and sure supply of water for the arsenal, located about 4 miles from and considerably above the reservation. The land and water right to this spring can be secured for not more than $30,000. Due to much lower maintenance costs, the utilization of this spring would be more economical in the end than the drilling of the well.

The amount of money, $96,000, authorized for the purchase of land was nearly all required for acquirement of the arsenal reservation, and it is therefore necessary to secure legislative authority to expend not to exceed $30,000 for the purchase of land and water right from $100,000 held for the development of the water supply. Furthermore, since this $100,000 reverts to the Treasury on July 1, 1921, it is necessary that authority also be obtained making this balance available during the fiscal year 1922 for the construction of the pipe line.

The following item will give the necessary authority:

"Of the $5,000,000 which the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, was authorized in the second deficiency act, approved March 6, 1920, to expend during the fiscal year 1921 for the construction of storage facilities for ammunition and components thereof, $100,000 is hereby made available during the fiscal year 1922 for the development of a water supply for Ogden Arsenal, Utah: Provided, That not to exceed $30,000 of the amount herein made available for this purpose may be expended for the purchase of such land and water rights as may be necessary to provide a suitable water supply for Ogden Arsenal."

It is requested that the above item be included in the deficiency bill now pending before passage.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN W. Weeks, Secretary of War.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN W. WEEKS, Secretary of War.

Mr. WARREN. I merely desired to know whether the work was near completion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated. The Reading Clerk. At the proper place under the subhead "Public Buildings Commission" insert:

The accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized to credit to the account of the disbursing officer of the Public Buildings Commission the sum of $354.51 heretofore expended for the repair and upkeep of an automobile, and charge the same to the appropriation for the Public Buildings Commission.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, two years ago there was $10,000 appropriated for the Public Buildings Commission. Last summer the commission obtained an automobile from the United States Housing Commission for use on official business. It was in such condition that it cost $354.51 to have it repaired. When the bill was presented and the claim was made for it by the commission, the auditor called attention to the fact that the law provides that no money shall be expended by any Government agency for the purchase, repair, or maintenance of an automobile unless specifically provided for.

I will state that we ran the automobile for a few months and decided that we did not want it at all, and returned it to the Housing Commission. The amendment simply authorizes the payment out of the $10,000 appropriated for the Public Buildings Commission of $354.51, expended for the repair of the automobile.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate struck out of the bill, on page 38, the provision with reference to the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, I think he was not in the Chamber when that matter was discussed a while ago. It was settled in this way: That on motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Pomerene] there were several words put over in another place where the Bureau of Standards is charged with the investigation of the matter under consideration.

I stated then, as I wish to state now, that it is a House proposition and was cut out in the Senate committee because it was thought that it was duplicating the work. I wish to say to the Senator that on further consideration of the remarks made by other Senators, especially the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], I stated that more than likely the conferees who will have charge of it would restore it. We shall look it up, and I am very certain that the Senator will be satisfied with the outcome.

Mr. McNARY. May I ask the chairman of the committee if it included the word "cement"?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes.

Mr. McNARY. The reason why I speak of the matter is because of a letter that I have just received from Secretary of the Interior Fall.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; a similar letter came to me not four minutes ago.

Mr. McNARY. It seems to be very important that the matter should be cared for.

Mr. WARREN. Since the Senator has made the motion, I will ask to have the letter from Secretary Fall placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, June 3, 1921.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,

Hon. Francis E. Waren,

Chairman Committee on Appropriations,

United States Senate.

My Dear Senator: My attention has been called to the fact that your committee struck from the deficiency appropriation bill an item on page 38 of the printed bill, under the head of "Bureau of Mines." This item provided $35,000 for scientific and technologic investications concerning the mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of heavy clay products, cement, feldspar, slate, and other nonmetallies.

I consider the appropriation really necessary for one of the purposes mentioned in the bill particularly; that is, for investigation of cement costs, etc.

The Government of the United States is, as you know, a large purchaser and user of cement, particularly through the Reclamation Bureau of this department. The annual report of the Reclamation Service discloses the fact that up to June 30, 1920, this bureau alone used 3,000,000 barrels of cement.

Last year construction was quite limited, and yet we used 38,183 barrels, which cost us, without freight, $162,557, and the freight upon which was $32,038. Further examination of the tables before me will show that cement purchased at approximately the same time from the same contractor, for use on different projects, varies in price materially.

me will show that cement purchased at approximately the same time from the same contractor, for use on different projects, varies in price materially.

Personal experience has led me to understand that there is an undoubted agreement between many of the cement producers as to territory and an agreement for noncompetition between them in such territories; for example, at one point in my State 116 miles from a cement plant at El Paso, the prices furnished by the cement factory at El Paso and the cement companies at Kansas City, Mo., are exactly the same from year to year and day to day. Prices for shipment to this point will not be quoted you at Kansas City or at El Paso, but the only quotations which you can get are for the cement delivery or price for the same, in one instance with a haul of 116 miles, and in the other, of approximately 700 miles.

As the Government itself is such a heavy purchaser of cement for use in this one department alone, it would appear to be a very material benefit to us to ascertain the costs at different points in the United States at which we are purchasing cement for use upon the different projects.

This matter has been before the public in other forms, and, as you are aware, many of the cement manufacturers are under criminal indictment, and as we were informed yesterday, a civil suit has also been filed against them.

This was my purpose in recommending this particular appropriation, and I am much in hopes that upon reconsideration you will accept an amendment replacing this item in the bill. I am sending a copy of this communication to Senator McNary, chairman of the Senate Committee on Irrigation.

As you know, proposed bills are now before the Senate and the House providing for some method of largely increasing reclamation development within the next few years.

Very sincerely, yours,

Albert B. Fall.

Mr. WARREN. I will now ask that the action of the Senate

ALBERT B. FALL.

Mr. WARREN. I will now ask that the action of the Senate may be reconsidered, in order that I may move a disagreement to the Senate committee amendment, so that it may be put back in its place, and that will end the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. question now is on agreeing to the amendment, which will be

The READING CLERK. On page 38 the committee propose to strike out lines 19 to 26 in the following words:

BUREAU OF MINES.

For inquiries and scientific and technologic investigations concerning the mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of heavy clay products, cement, feldspar, slate, and other nonmetallics; including all equipment, supplies, expenses of travel and subsistence; fiscal year 1922, $35,000: Provided, That no part thereof may be used for investigation in behalf of any private party.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARREN. I believe that completes the committee amendments.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as a part of my remarks I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD the law prohibiting deficiencies in the various departments, except under certain circumstances. The Cabinet officers are all new appointees, and I believe that if they will read the law we shall in future have fewer estimates for deficiencies. Up to the present time there have been sent to the Senate and to the House estimates for $222,000,000 of deficiencies.

I will state that a good many years ago the custom became almost universal of sending to Congress estimates for deficiencies, and in consequence the law which I ask to have printed in the RECORD was enacted. After that deficiency appropriations almost disappeared from our statutes, but during the World War conditions were such that the practice was resumed. I hope now, however, the war being over, that the departments will obey the law and cease sending in estimates for deficiency appropriations.

In this connection I desire to say that I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will notify the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the other House that in the next deficiency appropriation bill which is to be sent over here from that body it is expected that all items which should be covered by the regular appropriation bills will be eliminated. The pending deficiency bill as it came here from the House carried $76,000,000 of deficiencies and $24,000,000, in round numbers, of regular appropriations, which should have been carried in other measures. Some of the members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations were in favor of eliminating those items, and if it had not been for the emergency which existed in some cases I believe that action would have been taken. However, the committee, instead of carrying those appropriations into the body of the bill, transferred them to the end of the bill and placed them under the head of "Emergencies." think that Congress ought to limit deficiency appropriation bills to deficiencies and carry in the regular appropriation bills the items which properly belong in those bills.

I thought it proper that I should make these remarks, and I now ask to have the law to which I have referred printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The law referred to is as follows:

DEFICIENCIES IN APPROPRIATIONS PROHIBITED—VOLUNTARY SERVICES FORBIDDEN.

No executive department or other Government establishment of the United States shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year or involve the Government in any contract or other obligation for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations, unless such contract or obligation is authorized by law. Nor shall any department or any officer of the Government accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law, except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property. All appropriations made for contingent expenses or other general purposes, except appropriations made in fulfillment of contract obligations expressly authorized by law, or for objects required or authorized by law without reference to the amounts annually appropriated therefor, shall, on or before the beginning of each fiscal year, be so apportioned by monthly or other allotments as to prevent expenditures in one portion of the year which may necessitate deficiency or additional appropriations to complete the service of the fiscal year for which said appropriations are made; and all such apportionments shall be adhered to and shall not be waived or modified except upon the happening of some extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance which could not be anticipated at the time of making such apportionment, but this provision shall not apply to the contingent appropriations of the Senate or House of Representatives; and in case said apportionments are waived or modified as herein provided, the same shall be waived or modified in writing by the head of such executive department or other Government establishment having control of the expenditure, and the reasons therefor shall be fully set forth in each particular case and communicated to Congress in connection with each particular case and communicated to Congress in connection with each particular case and communicated to Congres

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the remarks of my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Curtis], are very timely; I agree with him perfectly; but I think, under the existing situation, a few words from me become necessary, explanatory of the reasons why that condition arose.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations has for many years fought against large deficiency appropriations where they were unnecessary; but, of course, with the privileges which the heads of departments have and the uncertainties as to some of the appropriations, we could not, without doing violent injus-tice, entirely eliminate deficiency appropriations. Eight years ago there came a change of administration, which created certain disturbances such as always follow a change of administration, either way. Following that almost immediately came the shadow of war and then actual war.

My idea-and I think it is the idea of others-is that in war time in order to win it is necessary that there shall be coordination and quick action, and that only one person may properly be regarded as the head of the Army and Navy. Therefore, under then existing circumstances and with the idea of winning the war, whatever the cost, knowing that it was necessary to win it quickly or that it would bankrupt us, points of order were not raised and precedents were not cited, as would have been done under different conditions. A bill would come before the Committee on Appropriations in connection with which requests would be presented for appropriations, which we would then provide for; but a month later perhaps some emergency would arise or there would be a new requirement, and those needing additional appropriations would go to some other committee-the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Naval Affairs, or to almost any other committee—and present their demands. So we said no to nothing which seemed to tend to a successful prosecution of the war.

Since the war we find we have an immense hangover. We have claims presented from every direction. We have more than $300,000,000 of claims on account of patents alone in one department, that of the Attorney General. We have also hundreds of millions of dollars of claims before other departments. Some of these matters have come up unexpectedly, and they require examination; but a deficiency appropriation is required to cover items which were not expected. That has led to confusion.

Then, to make "confusion worse confounded," the other House changed its rules, as it had a perfect right to do, of course, and I speak with perfect respect of that matter. They took the consideration of appropriation bills away from several committees and put them all back under one committee. One committee may perform that task, and in ordinary conditions it would be a great economy to have appropriations so handled; but when one committee undertakes that work it requires-and that is especially true in a short session—the appointment of subcommittees upon which the entire committee may fully de-When the subcommittee makes its report as to a special line of appropriation it is hardly possible for the full committee to give very much time to the consideration of that report.

After the war, when we were burdened with thousands, and I had almost said millions, of employees-certainly with many more than were necessary—certain subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations of the other House—for instance, the subcommittee on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—reported in favor of making certain reductions here and there in the number of employees. They did that, perhaps, without accurate information, having in mind the fact that those who are employed hesitate about losing their employment, and the chiefs are very likely to protect their employees, without regard to the Treasury of the United States. Hence the chairman of the subcommittee on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill of the House Committee on Appropriations, when these deficiency items were presented and when the additions which are not properly deficiencies for the year 1922 were inserted in the bill, stated that in preparing the regular appropriation bill he was conscious of having, perhaps, cut out more than in some cases was necessary, but after making two or three efforts without a sufficient response and action on the part of the several departments, he would undertake to cut low enough, with the idea that if the number of employees of some of the departments was reduced more than should have been the case we should hear from them, as, of course, his experience in legislation showed him was always the

It has developed that some employees who were not appropriated for were needed. Hence the subcommittee in charge of the deficiency appropriation bill at the other end of the Capitol took the matter up, and while they did not place the items in a separate category, as the Senate committee has done, they were considered on the floor by the full membership and were adopted there.

It is true, almost without exception, that the sum total of the items passed by the House is the same as that incorporated in the bill by the Senate committee. We have stricken some out and others have been inserted. It is true that in one or two of the departments we have added to the number of employees, especially in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency. That has been done for reasons that have been explained on this side of the Chamber and also by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] on the other side.

Now, as we are emerging from all the troubles incident to the recent war, we ought to go back to the old system of appropriating in the regular bills sufficient, but not too much, to carry on the necessary work of the Government, and then hold the departments and everyone else to the law and to the rules regarding deficiency appropriations.

To show that the Senate Committee on Appropriations has been keenly alive to the situation and extremely anxious for reformation, I will say that the chairman of that committee addressed a letter to the President of the United States within two weeks after the assembling of the present Congress, which I shall insert at this point as a part of my remarks, together with a copy of the letter sent by the President to the heads of the various departments and establishments in consequence:

APRIL 26, 1921.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I desire to call your attention to a matter which to me seems of great importance, namely, the manner of submission to Congress of deficiency estimates by the various departments and Government establishments.

mission to Congress of deficiency estimates by the various departments and Government establishments.

There have been many abuses along this line in the past, and now, after only 14 days of this session, deficiency estimates amounting to $215,891,228.62, contained in 36 different House documents, have been submitted to Congress for its consideration, and more are coming.

There is no question about estimates for strictly legal deficiencies submitted in accordance with the antideficiency provisions of law; but not all of these sums are of this character. I notice that some are for new work entirely and have no place whatsoever on deficiency bills. The items appearing to be for the fiscal year 1922, which does not begin until July 1, 1921, amount to $136,789,393.34. They should not come before us as deficiencies for the year 1921.

I am a believer in economy in national expenditures, in which belief I feel sure you sympathize. The one thing leading most directly to desired results in economy is teamwork between the legislative and executive branches of the Government.

It would seem that heads of departments and Government establishments and officers of the Government charged with the responsibility of submission of estimates should be held to a strict accountability. Now that the war is over, there seems to be little excuse for the various departments and establishments not conducting their expenditures more nearly within their appropriations.

nearly within their appropriations,

I am calling this matter to your attention because I realize that you are anxious to hold the appropriations down to the lowest amounts consistent with good administration.

Very respectfully, yours,

F. E. WARREN, Chairman,

APRIL 30, 1921.

My Dear Mr. Secretary: I am in receipt of a letter from Chairman Warren, of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, calling my attention to the fact that estimates now before the Congress call for approximately $216,000,000 of deficiency appropriations, and that the estimated deficiencies will run very much beyond that sum. I do not know of any more dangerous tendency in the administration of governmental departments, and I am very sure that we can never fix ourselves firmly on a basis of economy until the departments are conducted within the provisions made by Congress.

I wish you would call this matter to the attention of the various bureau chiefs so that a like situation will not be reported in future.

Sincerely, yours,

Sincerely, yours,

WARREN G. HARDING.

Thus it will be seen that the Senate committee has been very much alive to the situation; that the President of the United States is responsive and has mapped out for his executive heads a line of conduct in keeping with the law and the desires of

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the time of the Senate for just a moment to call attention to a certain feature of the pending bill. We have appropriated for many different departments and bureaus in the way of deficiency appropriations, but in the case of the Census Bureau we are taking from that bureau $250,000 that has been left over from the appropriations allotted to them for carrying on the work with which they have been intrusted. I am informed that nearly a million dollars appropriated for completion of the census work will be turned back into the Treasury July 1. I may say that the work of that bureau is more advanced than it ever was before following the taking of the decennial census, although the census was taken when salaries were higher than at any previous era. Mr. Rogers is an able, practical business man who has made a great success in life as a citizen and public official. Before assuming the duties as Director of the Census he had distinguished himself as a member of the railroad commission of the State of North Carolina.

I wish to say, as a former Director of the Census and on this account interested in the work of the bureau, that no man ever did more faithful work in this position than Mr. Rogers, the former director, and his assistant, Mr. Steuart, who has succeeded Mr. Rogers in that position. I should like to say that while I regret that politics changed the Director of the Census, President Harding, in my judgment, selected the ablest and best-informed Republican to direct that work, and I believe the record of Mr. Steuart will so demonstrate. While I was Director of the Census Bureau Mr. Steuart was Chief of the Division of Manufactures, and in my connection with the different departments and bureaus of the Government I never came in contact with a more efficient, able, or conscientious official. I am glad to state here that the employees of the bureau have done efficient work at all times and yet they have much of the time been underpaid. We hear much criticism in Congress about extravagance and inefficiency in the Government service, but this can not be truthfully said of the employees or officials of the Census Bureau.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WARREN. The Senate has now passed the deficiency appropriation bill, and has made various additions and amendments to the bill as agreed to by the House. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. Warren, Mr. Curtis, and Mr. Glass conferees on the part of the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5010, being the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5010) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amend-

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me to prefer a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. WADSWORTH, I yield,

Mr. McKELLAR. Several days ago my colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Shields], submitted and had referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate a resolution providing for the purchase of a portrait of former President Jackson to be hung at a suitable place in the Capitol. That committee has passed favorably upon the appropriation and the resolution is on the calendar, but it is desired to refer it also to the Committee on the Library. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. It will have to go to the Committee on the Library before being considered by the Senate. Mr. McKELLAR. It is intended that it shall go to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. LODGE. The motion, then, is to refer it to the Committee on the Library?

Mr. McKELLAR. To refer it to the Committee on the Library; that is all that is proposed. I ask unanimous consent that the pending business be temporarily laid aside so that that may be done

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKELLAR. The resolution is No. 75 on the calendar.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not understand that the motion is to consider and agree to the resolution. If it is, I object. I think the resolution ought to go to the Committee on the Library and be considered there.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is exactly what is proposed. It was first referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate for recommendation as to the expenditure from the contingent fund of $1,100 to purchase the portrait.

Mr. LODGE. If the motion is to refer the resolution to the Library Committee I have no objection to it, of course

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the motion I desire to make. Mr. LODGE. The resolution comes from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. McKELLAR. It does.

Mr. LODGE. And the Senator desires to take it from the calendar and refer it to the Committee on the Library

Mr. McKELLAR. And refer it, as reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to the Committee on the Library.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that the Senator from New York does not intend to go on with the Army bill to-night.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; Mr. President, I do not. Mr. LODGE. Therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 6, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 4803, the naval appropriation bill, to disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the naval appropriation bill, to disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry. Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. On December 20, 1913, the House had under consideration a currency bill with Senate amendments, or, I think, it was just one amendment-that is, the Senate struck out all after the enacting clause and inserted a new bill as one amendment. There was a motion made in the House to concur in the amendment. That was voted down, Thereupon the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Glass] asked that the conference requested by the Senate be agreed to. Whereupon Mr. Mann made a parliamentary inquiry, and said:

Mr. Mann. Would it be in order at this time to offer a motion to instruct the conferees before the conference asked for by the Senate has been agreed to, or would that motion have to come afterwards? At the proper time I desire to make that motion.

The Speaker. It would come after the agreement for the conference and before the conference are announced.

Mr. Glass. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move that the House agree to the request for the conference asked for by the Senate.

The Speaker. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House agree to the conference on this bill asked for by the Senate. Without objection, the conference is agreed to. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. They would not have to come back to the House before disagreeing to it.
Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If I have the floor. I do not mean to intimate it is the intention of the conferees to disagree to it, but some time the House will have to vote upon the proposition, and it seems to me now is as good a time as any.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. Speaker, I should prefer Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. to make a motion now to instruct the conferees.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If I have the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Do I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to say that the conferees could disagree to the legislation in the bill without coming back to the House under the new rule?

Mr. WALSH. The conferees can not take any action with reference to that under the new rule—

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The new rule says they shall not agree to any legislation put on in violation of the House rules without receiving instruction from the House so to do. They could disagree and the Senate conferees could recede.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman a question, if the gentleman from Tennessee will give me his attention? I do not know what his motion will be, but as I recall the proceedings in the Senate this so-called Borah amendment was agreed to by unanimous consent. It may be possible to agree to it in the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that the Borah amendment, of course, will be brought to the House at the proper time. No introductions are necessary to accomplish that.

Mr. GARNER. What would the gentleman say to disagreeing to all the Senate amendments except the so-called Borah amendment and agree to that amendment by unanimous consent? You can do anything in the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think it is best to go to conference on the entire bill, inasmuch as the House understands that this amendment will be brought back for action by the House. There is no disposition in any quarter to have the Senate conferees recede as to this amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will.

Mr. GARNER. I merely want to ascertain what the unanimity of opinion is in this House or in the Senate.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say very frankly to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], who winks as he speaks, that there could not be an agreement to the Borah amendment by unanimous consent. I do not think the gentleman from Texas is himself in favor of recommending action to the President on the question of calling a conference on disarmament in the narrow and restricted way that the Borah amendment does. If we are to act in that matter, and I think we should, we should act not merely in concert with one or two nations that may arrogate to themselves supremacy in the world, but after full and free conference with the nations of the world having considerable war establishments, and, furthermore, when the question of the limitation of armaments is considered it should be considered with a view of limiting armaments on land as well When the nations consider the question of naval establishments they should consider the question of limitation or reduction of naval establishments, and not merely the reduction of programs as the Borah amendment provides. I do not think that after consideration the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] himself will desire this question be entered upon in the narrow, restricted, and unsatisfactory way that the Borah amendment provides.

I recall that when this bill was under con-Mr. GARNER. sideration in the House the gentleman from Wyoming did not want to consider it in the broadest conception or narrowest conception either.

Mr. MONDELL. In the proper way and at the proper time I desired it considered.

Mr. GARNER. But it did go to another body, and that body did consider this matter in a narrow and restricted way. should rather have the method that is in the bill, the Borah amendment, than not to have any disarmament resolution at all.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. GARNER. I will.

Mr MONDELL. The gentleman knows perfectly well that he and the other Members of the House will have an opportunity to vote on this matter before it is disposed of.

Mr. GARNER. I hope so. Mr. MONDELL. It would be very easy to have an agreement on that proposition.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Just a moment. It is very clear te me that the motion, if it is made—I do not understand that it has been made yet—to instruct the conferees to agree to legislation inserted in the bill by the Senate would be in violation of the rules of the House. The conferees would have no authority to agree to legislation put on the bill in the Senate, under our new rule.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yie Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will yield. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question. I want to ask—and I would like to make the same inquiry of the gentleman from Wyoming-this question: The two gentlemen are in favor of broadening this Borah resolution to include disarmament on land as well as on the

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman that I have not consulted with the other gentlemen who will be conferees with me on this bill, and therefore I do not know what their attitude would be-the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. I have always been in the habit whenever I have had anything to do with the management of a measure of taking the views of the minority members into account and not making up my mind until opportunity for united action had been given. And so it seems to me, with the understanding that the House at the proper time will have opportunity to vote on the Borah amendment, the bill should go to conference without instructions of any kind.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I am very anxious, I will say to the gentleman, to vote on the Borah amendment without any additional amendment for this reason: If you put disarmament on land as well as on sea in this thing, you are liable to kill both propositions. And I think there are a good many people in the country that would like to kill any sort of disarmament. I do not want to see them put together.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think the House can trust the conferees to bring this matter about in a proper form. I think the gentleman from Arkansas knows the membership of the committee on conference and has complete confidence in it.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Absolutely.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And there is no disposition anywhere to prevent the House from expressing its will on the subject. That being the case, why not follow the usual practice of allowing the conferees to go to conference unhampered?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Personally I feel that both of these propositions, the proposition to disarm on the seas and the proposition to disarm on the land, throughout the world, each of them, ought to stand on its own merits, because I believe there will be a division there, and if you vote for them together it is likely to kill both. I want to see both progress.

I know the question of taxation is the great question in this country, and we can not have reduction of taxation unless we have reduction of armament, and if we can not get both we ought to take one. Therefore, whenever the time comes I want both to stand on their own merits.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The House is not losing anything. It will be only a few days until this whole matter will be back here from the conference. No advantage will be lost, I will say to the gentleman. Why should the conferees, the three Republicans and the two Democrats who will sit on this conference. be hampered or restricted in any way by action of the House at this time when, as a matter of fact, this must of necessity come back under the rules within a few days to be acted on by the

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The motion that I shall offer will, if adopted, not eliminate this question from consideration by the conferees in its entirety. It will instruct the conferees to agree to the amendment with an amendment. Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. We could not do that, under the rules of the House. The conferees would have no jurisdiction to agree to a legislative proposal of this kind under the rules. We must bring it back.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman now to say what the Chair did not understand him to say at first. He does not simply wish to instruct to agree, but to agree with an amendment?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes. That is my theory of the parliamentary situation. If the House should disagree to all the Senate amendments and agree to the conference, I do not myself believe that it would then be in order to move to instruct them to agree to a specific amendment, because that would be undoing exactly what the House had a moment before done, namely, disagree. But I do think unquestionably, under the precedents I have cited, that it is in order to instruct them to agree to the amendment with an amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not press that motion. I believe when it is thoroughly understood the House will feel that they ought to leave the matter entirely open to the conferees. Let me suggest to the gentleman that there is a rapid change of sentiment going on with regard to the Borah amendment, and that the people of the country understand, as they are beginning to understand now, that the Borah amendment is merely a restriction on existing programs; that it is not complete, that it will not effect what the people desire and what we all desire, I hope, namely, to secure a national agreement for the reduction of armament, not for the Navy alone and not with three powers alone but with all the world and with regard to all military burdens. The people of the country demand that there should be a reduction not only of navies but of armies.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes. Mr. WINGO. This is a naval bill. How are you going to make in order an agreement for a reduction of the Army on the

Mr. TOWNER. The amendment has little to do with the Navy. It proposes that there shall be a reduction in the programs of three nations. That is the basis and strength of it.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman thinks that the point of order would not be well taken, but that the general question is one of armament, and that having covered one phase of it, we cover all

Mr. TOWNER. Yes. That is what I believe the people desire.

Mr. WINGO. I agree with the gentleman's parliamentary interpretation, but I do not agree with his position.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I will modify my request to the House. I ask unanimous consent that we take the bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the amendments made by the Senate, and agree to the conference, and ask that the conferees be permitted to go to the conference without

The SPEAKER. That is the same. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and that the conferees be not instructed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object to the latter part, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I did not object to the first part of the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has withdrawn that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has the gentleman also withdrawn his first request?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. My first request was dual.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it. Mr. OLDFIELD. Would it be in order at this time to instruct the conferees to agree to the Borah amendment?

The SPEAKER. Certainly it would not,

Mr. RAYBURN. I object.
The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted-

VETERANS' BUREAU.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6611.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Anderson] will please take the chair.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will it be in order now by unanimous consent to prefer a unanimous-consent request as in

The SPEAKER. It might be done by unanimous consent. Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that when we adjourn to-day we adjourn until Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until Monday.

Mr. DUNBAR. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, ordinarily this is the day for the consideration of the Private Calendar. There is some very important business on the Private Calendar, which had to give way for the consideration of the bill before us. Why could not the day have been devoted to the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar and the House continue in session to-morrow, and then consider the bill that is before us to-day?

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes.

Mr. KING. What legislation does the gentleman refer to? Mr. DUNBAR. I have reference to legislation where a man paid into the United States Treasury

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has reference to claims

Mr. DUNBAR. I have.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope we shall be able to reach claims bills on the Private Calendar in due time, but it seems to me we should dispose of these very important public bills first.

Mr. DUNBAR. I agree with the gentleman; but we could dispose of this very important business to-morrow, and we could have considered the Private Calendar to-day.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am always here; I am never away. I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to sit to-morrow. I shall be here and be at work. But many of the committees have been denied the privilege of sitting during the sessions of the House. Much committee work needs to be done. Many Members have been in constant attendance in the House during this hot weather. They need time to catch up with their correspondence and attend to matters that it is very important in the interest of their constituents they should give attention to.

I think the great majority of the Members believe that it would be well during the summer to establish the rule, and unless the condition of the public business forbids, to adhere to the rule of adjourning over Saturday each week. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNBAR. Can the gentleman indicate when he thinks the Private Calendar will have a day?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not say how soon, but as the gentleman knows I am one of those who believe that bills on the Private Calendar are entitled to prompt consideration by the House, and as promptly as possible I trust we shall consider these bills.

Mr. DUNBAR. I will not object this time, but in the future I will object, unless the Private Calendar has a day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not like to object to any procedure for which the majority leader asks unanimous consent, but we have a bill before us; and everybody connected with it, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the Vocational Rehabilitation Board, the Public Health Service, the American Legion, and the disabled soldiers say is of the most vital importance that it be enacted into law at once.

Mr. MONDELL. I heartily agree with the gentleman.
Mr. RAYBURN. And I had much rather that we should go ahead to-morrow and try to finish this bill, which I believe we could do.

Mr. MONDELL. I agree with the gentleman as to the importance of the legislation, and if I believed that by remaining in session to-morrow we would advance the final enactment of the legislation by one day, I should certainly want to continue

Mr. RAYBURN. It may become very important at some future time.

Mr. MONDELL. I doubt if it would expedite the passage of the bill if we were to remain in session to-morrow.

Mr. POU. With the gentleman's kind permission, there is also another matter of world-wide importance, and that is the making of peace with Germany. Possibly that might be ratified to-morrow. We have had the repeated assurance of the President that he is ready with pen in hand to sign it. Why not continue in session to-morrow and consider that?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say frankly to the gentleman that at the request of many Members, including Members on the minority side, we thought it best to give reasonable advance notice as to the time when the peace resolution would be taken up, and, Providence permitting, we expect that it will be taken up next Thursday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next?

There was no objection.

VETERANS' BUREAU.

The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6611) to establish in the Treasury Department a veterans' bureau and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau, and further to amend and modify the war risk insurance act, with Mr. Anderson in the chair.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, when I have occupied 30 minutes I wish the Chair would notify me.

Gentlemen of the House, I do not hope to add very much to the very lucid discussion of this bill which was engaged in yesterday by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Sweet], but I do desire to call attention to some of the features of this legislation and some of the reasons why its very speedy enactment is desirable.

All the activities of the United States Government, so far as ex-service men are concerned, have been established by Congress more or less by piecemeal. They have been a sort of fungous growth upon other acts which had already been put into effect. For instance, the original bill passed granting compensation and providing for allotments and allowances and for Government insurance of men in the service was not passed as an independent act, but was an amendment to a law already in existence known as the war risk insurance law, which had been provided for by Congress to take care of the insurance upon vessels and cargoes upon the high seas which were unable to obtain insurance from private companies. These subjects were wholly unrelated; but in view of the fact that a war risk insurance act was already in force, it was thought by Congress and by the committee that it would be more convenient simply to amend the law already in existence known as the war risk insurance act than it would be to pass an independent act and perhaps call it by some similar name, so that the war risk insurance act as it applies to ex-service men is an amendment to the original war risk insurance act passed by Congress before we made any provision for compensation, allotments, and insur-

The same is true of the vocational rehabilitation act, of which I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] was the author. We had already enacted a law providing for vocational training under a Federal Board for Vocational Education.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I think, if the gentleman will recall, he is mistaken about the vocational rehabilitation act for industrial cripples. I think he will find that that succeeded the service men's act rather than preceded it. As I recall it, the industrial bill was passed in the fall of 1919 and the soldier act in June, 1918.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the gentleman is correct about that. At any rate, the two subjects were grafted onto each other, although they were unrelated except in so far as rehabilitation is concerned.

The same is true of the activities of the Public Health Service. I do not recall that there has been a specific act passed by Congress since the war started amending the Public Health Service act as it was originally enacted, but in all these bills which we have passed affecting ex-service men we have made it possible for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and for the Vocational Education Board to make use of the Public Health Service in all matters that pertained to the examination and hospitalization of the ex-service men.

The bill which we are now considering undertakes to do what everybody in the Government, with very few exceptions, and what the ex-service men themselves and what Members of Congress have realized for a long time ought to be done, and what in all probability would have been done in the beginning if we had had more time to deliberate and could have foreseen the conditions which have existed.

There never was any logic, and there is still less logic now, in having the benefits to which the men are entitled scattered among three different departments of the United States Government. When we think about it and try to account for some of the inefficiencies and inexcusable delays that have occurred in these departments I marvel that there has been as much efficiency as there has been; when you consider that if a man needed to be hospitalized he had to go to the Public Health Service, that if he needed compensation for some injury he had to go to the War Risk Bureau, and if he needed vocational training and rehabilitation on account of the particular injury for which he was being hospitalized and compensated he had to go to an entirely different bureau of the Government

Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Has the gentleman received a communication from Col. Galbraith on behalf of the American Legion calling attention to the fact that the proposed amendment to the Sweet bill will do away with the provision for this decentralization?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I have received it, and I suppose other Members have received it, and I am going to discuss that question a little later, if the gentleman will permit.

Now, what has been demanded on the part of everybody concerned in the welfare of the ex-service men has been that there should be one bureau-one department-that has charge of every function of the United States Government dealing with the welfare and training, the rehabilitation, the hospitalization, the compensation, and insurance of all the men and women who are subject to the provisions of the law.

I do not desire to take the time of this House in recounting individual instances in which injustice has resulted by reason of the division of authority. Every Member here has had numerous cases called to his attention, and one of the reasons urged by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and by the American Legion, which has been very enthusiastic and active in urging this legislation, has been that many mistakes that were made by the men and by the bureaus dealing with them occurred from the fact that these men had been scattered all over the United States.

The Government sent forms which were to be filled out by them, or affidavits to be executed by them, in order that they might present claims for compensation or for insurance or for vocational training to the proper bureau of the Government. When these affidavits or papers come in, whatever might be their form or nature, the bureau in Washington discovers that there has been a mistake made. The form had not been filled out correctly or some essential information had been omitted which made it impossible for the department to pass on the claim and make the award.

The board or bureau writes back to the man and advises him of the mistake that has been made or the deficiency in the evidence which has been submitted, and consequently there is a long line of correspondence between the soldier in California or Vermont or elsewhere and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, if it is compensation or insurance, and the Federal board, if it is a matter of vocational training. So that we have one enterprise, one service, one function of the United States Government dealing with some man who, when he takes it up with Washington, finds that it is a hydra-headed institution, and when he has taken it up with one head he does not know whether it is the right head or whether he should take it up with all three branches.

This bill seeks to do what in all probability would have been done in the beginning if we had had proper time to deliberate. It abolishes the War Risk Insurance Bureau, it abolishes the Rehabilitation Section of the Board for Vocational Education so far as it affects the ex-service men, and it abolishes the Public Health Service in so far as it affects the examination and passing upon the claims of individual soldiers. All these functions are to be consolidated, not coordinated, but consolidated under one bureau which shall hereafter be known as the veterans' bureau, at the head of which will be a director.

I think we can not fail to recognize the magnitude of the task which is incumbent on the Government of the United States with reference to the treatment of our ex-service men. were more than 5,000,000 men in the United States Army and Navy and Marine Corps and other branches of the service who may become entitled to treatment by the bureau when it shall be established. During the Civil War there were something more than 2,400,000 men in the United States Army. the first 25 years after the Civil War the peak was not reached in the consideration of claims of various kinds that occurred during the Civil War. In other words, the peak of all claims that were filed, of one kind and another, by Federal soldiers as the result of the Civil War was not reached until 25 years had elapsed after the close of that war. And at the end of 36 years from the close of the Civil War there had been 579,115 invalid claims allowed by the United States Government for men who served in the Union Army during the four years of the Civil War.

At the same rate for the Army of more than 5,000,000 men, by the year 1956, which would be 35 years from now, there would be 1,209,950 disability claims allowed by the veterans' bureau for men in service of the United States during the recent war.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does not the gentleman think that possibly, in view of legislation that was made for the World War veterans, the peak may be reached earlier?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it will.
Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In other words, that we have anticipated the probabilities of the situation?

Mr. BARKLEY. Some authorities in the Public Health Service and Vocational Board and War Risk Bureau think that the peak will be reached at some period from 5 to 10 years from now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A certain general of the Public Health Service testified before the Joint Committee on Education a few days ago that in his judgment the peak of restoration for physical disability as far as hospitalization is concerned would be received probably by the year 1998 be reached probably by the year 1926.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. That is five years from now. There have already been treated by the Public Health Service of the United States up to May 1, 150,000 men. There have been what the Bureau of Public Health calls 9,000,000 hospital relief days granted to ex-service men by the Public Health Service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Since when?

Mr. BARKLEY. Since they began hospital treatment under the various laws which have been passed by Congress for the benefit of the service men. In addition to that there have been also 1,200,000 days of what they call out-patients' treatmentmen who call on the Public Health officers in their various offices and receive treatment just as I would go to a doctor's office to get treatment if I had an ailment. There have been 1,000,000 medical examinations made by the Bureau of Public Health Service up to the 1st day of May of this year, and on the 21st day of May there were in the Public Health Service hospitals of the United States 16,185 men. In addition to that there were about 10,000 men under the jurisdiction of the Public Health Service in other hospitals of a private and public nature. So that on the 21st of May of this year under the Public Health Service in hospitals, either public or private, being treated by this service, there were 26,000 ex-service men, and the number applying to the Public Health Service for treatment is increasing at the rate of about 1,000 a month. That will give us some idea of the magnitude of this proposition from the mere standpoint of the treatment of the ex-service men by the Public Health Service either in hospitals or in a private capacity.

On the 1st day of May there were in the Vocational Rehabilitation Section, as applied to the ex-service man, actually in training, 72,056, under section 2, and a total of 86,860 men had entered section 2 training since the passage of the law. The number who had entered training on the 1st day of May, 1921, under section 3 was 10,698. There were 87 who had come under the Elks' fund, which was provided for by the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, a fund of $250,000, which was advanced to ex-service men to enable them to receive treatment; but that was discontinued on the 1st day of March and is not longer available. The number in training under section 3 on May 1 was 7,958. The number of men on May 1 eligible for training under section 2 was 124,948, and the number eligible but for whom training is not feasible was 18,219. That means that their cases have already been passed upon and that they are eligible for training. They have had their cases submitted, but for one reason or another, either by reason of ill health or other circumstances, training is not feasible. Many of these men are suffering from tuberculosis and are unable to undergo training provided for by the Federal board. There are 18,219 The number of men eligible for training under section of them. 3 of the Vocational Board on May 1 was 82,818, and there were in training 7,958. The number of men who have declined training as of May 1 was 5,982, and the number who postponed training for one reason or another was 19,433. The number whose training has been completed as of May 1 was 3,562. The number whose training has been discontinued as of May 1 was 2,565. The number whose training had been interrupted for one reason or another-some of them received employment and had gone out in order to make money to tide them over-was 7,994. number of men who died while undergoing training was 883, and the total number who had applied in one form or another for training under the Federal board as of May 15 was 357,877.

When you consider the number of treatments which have been given by the Public Health Service, as I recounted them a moment ago, and the number of men now in hospitals under the care of the Public Health Service, the number of treatments that have been given to men either in hospitals or in private capacities, and the number of applications that are being filed every month for hospital treatment, and considering that up to May 15 of this year there have been more than 350,000 applications for vocational training under the Federal board, gentlemen will get some idea of the magnitude of the task which now confronts the people of the United States and the Government of the United States in dealing with the exservice men, and this does not take into account the number being compensated and insured under the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. As I understand the figures, there are 72,000 who are eligible under section 3 and only 7,000 have entered. Section 3 does not pay allowance fees. The question was raised and has been strongly recommended that we eliminate section 3 altogether and include all applicants under section 3 the same as under section 2.

Mr. BARKLEY. That suggestion has been made, and while I have not gone into the matter deeply I am inclined to favor that amendment to the law, because it is true that in all probability there are many men who are not able to qualify under section 2, because the board can not find that they are not able to perform some gainful occupation, because many of them have been engaged in occupations that did not require great physical effort and they have been able to go back to those occupations, and where that is true the board declines to grant training under section 2. Yet nobody can tell when in the future the particular disability under which the man is suffering—although it may not deprive him of his occupation now-may deprive him of that occupation. It may occur two years or five years or any other period from now. The injury from which he suffers may make it wholly impossible for him to perform all of the duties of his lifetime occupation in the future, and certainly think the Federal board ought to have the power under these circumstances to grant men training under section 2 of Mr. FESS. The criticism is against the law and is not against the Federal board.

Mr. BARKLEY. No. I am inclined to think that the Federal board has in many cases construed section 2 liberally, and I am not surprised if they have permitted their humanity to allow them to be very liberal and in some cases have stretched the law a bit in order to grant section 2 training to these men, and I think in every such case it has been justified.

Mr. FESS. Our committee passed favorably upon this sort of measure last session.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY, Yes.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Along the line of hospitalization in section 9, does that put all these hospitals under the War Department, the Navy Department, and the Interior Department under this bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. It says he is authorized to utilize the now existing or future facilities, and then it says they must furnish such facilities as the director may deem necessary. My question is whether he is to be the final arbiter?

Mr. BARKLEY. The hospitals which are in the Army, Navy, and Interior Department are not to be under the jurisdiction of the veterans' bureau, but wherever the hospitals of the United States Government, either under the Public Health Service or under the veterans' bureau, are not sufficient to care for the men under the jurisdiction of the veterans' bureau, the director is authorized to utilize any other hospital facilities in any Government department—that is, the War, Navy, or Interior Department—but whenever a patient is put in these hospitals he is under the jurisdiction of the department which has control of the hospital, except that the director, of course, is presumed in advance to make regulations and to make agreements with the hospitals how they are to be cared for. But the hospital itself remains under the jurisdiction of the War, Navy, or the Interior, as the case may be.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I possibly did not make my question clear. What I meant was in case the hospital authorities of the Navy or the War Department said they had no room for these men, who is to determine—

Mr. BARKLEY. Section 9 does not give the director any power to commandeer hospitals that are under the Army or the Navy. It simply authorizes him to make use of such Navy and Army facilities as are available, and, of course, that is to be done by agreement with the department. It is upon a request for hospital service made by the director.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. May I ask the gentleman's attention? I am all for this bill-

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. It further says "and such governmental agencies are hereby authorized and directed to furnish such facilities," and so forth, "as the director may deem neces-What I wanted to bring out was that if there were any doubt as to the ultimate authority here it might be a good idea to clear it up, and it seemed to me there was a doubt.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, if there are vacant hospitals under the War Department and the Secretary of War arbitrarily refused to put them at the disposal of the veterans' bureau, that would be an arbitrary action which I think could be cured by an order from the President himself, if necessary. If the veterans' bureau made a request for certain hospital space in the Navy Department, and they had no available space, and they made such a report to that effect, this law was not intended to give the director power to go and take it anyway. These departments are supposed to cooperate with one another, and we undertake to make these hospital facilities available to the veterans' bureau whenever needed, and I think it may be expected that the heads of the departments affected will work in harmony with respect to that matter,

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do.
Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It seems to me the question raised by the gentleman to my right is no more violent assumption than the thing we have been going through as in the case where the Army had barracks, for instance, that had not been occupied for 10 years or more, still they would not relinquish them for hospital purposes. If it is assumed that the War Department will more readily yield a portion of the hospitals which are now occupied than to yield barracks which have not been occupied for 10 years and for which it has no plans for further occupancy, that is a question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, this law specifically authorizes the director to call for this hospital service, and if any department should arbitrarily refuse to comply with such request, it would be a recalcitrant department in refusing to comply with a reasonable request when there was no reasonable ground for refusing

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That is just what happened in the case to which I referred, and I can name an instance, if the gentleman wishes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to take up too much time on this matter.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Request was twice made, but they could not get them to make a transfer. It was only by act of Congress that we got those barracks,

Mr. BARKLEY. Congress can not make a transfer in this case by act of Congress, because we can not see far enough in the future to foretell what Army and Navy hospital facilities will be needed, but we are giving the director power to call upon the Army and Navy for these hospital facilities, and then if the Army and Navy should refuse, I think the President could order the Secretary of War to grant such facilities.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. This debate ought to make

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield myself 15 minutes additional. Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Massa-

Mr. ROGERS. Assume that the Secretary of War, having control over certain hospitals, as a measure of protection against a possible epidemic or anything of the kind, thought he ought to have a margin of 50 per cent reserve of vacant beds in order to take care of possible future emergencies. Suppose, on the other hand, the director of the veterans' bureau thought that that margin was unreasonable and they could not get Is it the view of the gentleman from Kentucky, who has had much to do with the framing of this bill, that that controversy would be settled by the President of the United

Mr. BARKLEY, I think he could settle it. Of course, it is a rather violent assumption, I think, to say that either the director of the bureau or the Secretary of War would be un-reasonably arbitrary about the matter. I concede the director has no power to go there and take by force of arms any hospital beds that may be under the jurisdiction of the War Department, and I do not know of any law that we could enact that would empower the director forcibly and physically to take any hospital that is under the jurisdiction of the War Department.

Mr. ROGERS. The War Department is directed to furnish such hospital equipment, and so forth, as the director may deem necessary. In other words, it seems to me the authority. is with the director, and you take it away altogether, in case of controversy, from the Secretary of War in a case of that

Mr. BARKLEY. If there were available beds and hospitals, the demand of the director would be paramount to the arbitrary refusal of the Secretary of War, but if the Secretary of War in good faith reported he had no hospitals available or that he could not dispose of men in hospitals and put them somewhere else in order to make room for patients of the veterans' bureau, I do not think this law would confer on him absolute power to go and take them anyway.

Mr. ROGERS. I am afraid the law does that thing; that is, it enables the director to rob Peter to pay Paul,

Mr. BARKLEY. You have got to construe this with a reasonable degree of assurance that the War Department and the bureau will act in harmony and with reason. arbitrary refusal on the part of the Secretary of War to grant hospital facilities where they existed would give the power to take them, or take some action on the part of somebody, either by prosecution of the delinquency of the officer who made the refusal or otherwise.

Mr. ROGERS. The controversy is founded on good faith on each side.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the gentleman will recognize that Congress can pass no act that will bring these proprieties about or guarantee against controversy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield? Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama. Mr. BANKHEAD. In my experience a great deal of delay with these cases has been caused by reference by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to The Adjutant General's office to secure the military record of these men. Has any provision been made in the pending bill to facilitate the disposition of these War Department records for the benefit of the new director in order to save time in reference to the military records of these disabled men, and if so, what?

Mr. BARKLEY. The bill does not contain any provision so far as the War Department is concerned with reference to these records. Of course the gentleman will realize that the only place under the Government now where the military record of any ex-soldier of any war is kept is in the War Department. The Pension Bureau is compelled under the law as it exists now, and as it has always existed heretofore, to refer to The Adjutant General's office in order to get the military record of any soldier in the Civil War or any other war. It might be a good thing for convenience if there were some provision by which the military records of all the men in the World War were turned over to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. But the gentleman will recognize the fact that that would entail a lot of unnecessary work, because the bureau and the War Department can not know in advance who is going to make a claim under the law, either for compensation or hospitalization, or insurance, or anything else, and in order to give the bureau the benefit of these records without asking the War Department for them it would be necessary to file with the bureau copies of the records of all the soldiers of the war for the benefit of only those who will apply for assistance.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I appreciate the difficulties in the proposition, but when you decentralize an existing agency and distribute it into 14 State agencies, I feel that you are going to have a great deal of delay in consulting the records in The Adjutant General's office.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to refer to another thing in connection with the war risk insurance laws.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will,

Mr. WILLIAMSON. There was a great deal of discussion a couple of months ago about centralizing the hospitalization service here at Washington. Was that gone into by your committee? Is it the idea to distribute this hospitalization in the neighborhood of where the soldiers are, and where they need assistance of this kind, or is it your intention to centralize the hospitalization?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no intention to centralize the hospitalization, so far as Washington is concerned. You realize that these ex-service men are scattered all over the United States in about twelve hundred or thirteen hundred different hospitals or institutions. Not only are they in hospitals, but some of them are in county institutions-not very many, but some have been. In some cases they have been placed in care of the county almshouses. Now, the object of this bill and the veterans' bureau is not to keep the men in twelve hundred or thirteen hundred hospitals, but to centralize them as much as they can, allowing the men to be hospitalized as near to their homes as is possible and practical. I want to say right here that I do not think any Government anywhere ought to suffer one of its ex-service men who has been injured in the war to be placed in a county almshouse in order that he may receive any sort of treatment. It has not been the fault of Congress; it has not been the fault of any of these bureaus that it has been done; it has been the fault of a system that was created in a hurry when we were in the midst of war. And I want to say this for the War Risk Insurance Bureau and for the Federal Board for Vocational Education and the Publie Health Service, that I think, considering the limitations and division of authority, they have done wonderfully well in most cases in providing accommodations under the law for the men.

Mr. DENISON. The statement of the gentleman from Kentucky just now arouses my interest and has been somewhat shocking to me. What evidence have you of the fact that any of the disabled veterans were put in these almshouses: would be glad if the gentleman from Kentucky would inform the House where that took place, who were put there, and who put them there, in order to see if we can find who is responsi-

Mr. BARKLEY. I am unable to give the specific cases. But it was asserted on the floor of the Senate a number of times that that has been the case, and it has been stated frequently elsewhere. I know that men have been placed out in State asylums who were suffering from mental derangement due to the war.

They have been placed in insane asylums by arrangement between the Public Health Service or the Bureau of War Risk and the State which operated the asylum. Men have been placed at St. Elizabeths Asylum out here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DENISON. There is no other proper place to put men who are mentally deranged except in an institution of that kind. This bill provides that if there are no Federal institutions of that kind available, then the director of the veterans' bureau is authorized to make arrangements with State and county institutions and get the use of those very institutions.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not claim the Government can establish all of its own insane asylums, but still I think it is a reasonable statement to make that men who have been suffering not merely from mental derangements that would entitled them to be sent to an asylum or to such institutions controlled by the States, but men suffering from physical ailments have been placed in those institutions, and I think the gentleman will recall a good deal of indignation on the part of ex-service men and others interested in their welfare because men have been placed in those institutions who ought to have been placed in hospitals for the physical treatment of men, and not for their mental treatment. I am not undertaking to arraign the bureaus, but trying to show that all the institutions necessary for the mental, physical, and financial care of these men ought to be combined under one head.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. KINDRED. The gentleman does not advocate that the Government should own all the hospitals for the insane, does he? Mr. BARKLEY. I do not, but under this bill they could do

Mr. KINDRED. Does not the gentleman think that there will be more uniformity and efficiency of treatment and better results and higher standards, of which the ex-service men will get the benefit, if the United States Government does own and control the asylums?

Yes; I think that would probably be true, Mr. BARKLEY. although it would be physically impracticable for the Government to own or to build all the hospitals that may be needed for the ex-service men in the future, because if the Government did that it would come into possession of a lot of extra hospitals and have them on its hands when they are not needed, and if some private or State institutions are well equipped for the care of these men there is no objection to an arrangement being made between the Federal Government and the States to provide for their treatment. But I can not work myself up to believe that these men ought to be farmed out at so much per head per day to every kind of outside institutions.

Mr. KINDRED. Is not that a good argument in favor of the Government owning such institutions?

Mr. BARKLEY. It may own some, but perhaps not enough to care for all those who need treatment at present. But they should be placed in suitable and well-equipped institutions.

Mr. KINDRED. Are not all the existing institutions of that character that are controlled by the States and cities now so overcrowded that the ex-service men can not receive proper treatment in them?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, in some sections of the country that is probably true.

Mr. SPROUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL. I can probably answer my colleague's question that was asked a moment ago, if there are any cases of exsoldiers now being taken care of in county institutions. I want to tell of one institution in Illinois, the Oak Forest County institution. When I left there some months before it had 14 tuberculosis cases in that county. Of course, they were taken care of by the Federal Government, but it was in a county institution that they were being cared for. The boys objected to it. While they were getting good treatment there, still they did not like the idea that their friends were being taken care of in a county institution.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.
Mr. DENISON. I may have misunderstood as to exactly what the gentleman meant by the term "county almshouse" when he used that expression.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the gentleman that that is an old-fashioned expression that has been changed recently. I think they do not now call them "almshouses" but "county sanitariums.'

Mr. DENISON. I had the idea in my mind, when I heard the gentleman make his remarks, that he had reference to an ordinary almshouse or poorhouse, and I was shocked at the statement he made, and I thought that he meant that these men were put there by their friends and that it was because this Government would not take care of them.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman will realize that the word "almshouse" may have been injudiciously used, but it is really the truth, because in connection with the county aimshouse, which we used to call "the poorhouse," and which is now called the "county sanitarium," they have in many counties added a tuberculosis ward to the county sanitarium. But as the poet Says

You may break, you may shatter the vase if you will, But the scent of the roses will hang round it still.

It is still an almshouse, and the county poor go there by order of the court, and the ex-service men have been placed in those institutions that are called "sanitariums," and they and their friends have objected to that.

Mr. SWEET. I may say that in sending them there they have not been sent as paupers, but the Government is paying for their care and treatment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. They have not been sent there as charges upon the county, but the effect is just the same. effect in going there is just the same, whether the United States is paying for it or the county.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. Mr. FESS. I think the idea which the gentlemen of the House got from the statement of the gentleman is that the Government was neglecting these men, and that they had become wards of the county.

Mr. BARKLEY. No. What I meant was that there ought to be institutions of a high character in the United States where the Government could place these men without putting on them the stigma of being treated or trained or maintained in a county institution.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. Mr. SNYDER. I think the gentleman has the wrong idea about these county asylums and tubercular hospitals. In my own State every county must have its tubercular hospital. In my own county we have erected one with a sanitarium at a cost of $350,000. I recently made arrangements with the War Department so that we can get forty-odd tents to accommodate additional patients, and many of them are such men as you are talking about, for whom the Government is paying $20 a week. They do not understand that they are going to a county almshouse. It is a high-class county institution.

Mr. BARKLEY. It may be a high-class county institution, but that is not true in all the States.

Mr. SNYDER. The patients pay, and can be forced to pay. And that is a very proper thing. It permits the soldier to have proper attention nearer home than he would have if he were carried away to some distant institution. There are two sides to this question, and I think they ought to be understood.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are many institutions of this character where men are perfectly willing to go, but they ought not to be compelled to go to institutions whose chief function is to minister to the poor of the county.

Mr. SNYDER. Another thing, if the gentleman will permit. There have been cases where soldiers and sailors have had to go to almshouses for treatment because there were no other places for them to go in the immediate locality.

Mr. BARKLEY. In those particular cases they did not go under the orders of the United States Government.

Mr. SNYDER. But sometimes they have gone on account of the laxity and slowness of your War Risk Bureau in taking up cases to which their attention has been called.

Mr. BARKLEY. A lot of things have had to be done in the past that we hope will never have to be done again.

Mr. SNYDER. I agree with the gentleman.
Mr. BARKLEY. And that is the reason we are here with the bill, to make it unnecessary in the future to do things which were done before.

Mr. SNYDER. I hope it will work out that way. Mr. MacGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I have a very high regard for the gentleman's opinion. I should like to ask him about this. One of the criticisms has been that the Public Health Service has failed to function in connection with the War Risk Insurance It seems to me that the provision in the first bill, H. R. 3, was much more effective than the provision in the bill that is now under consideration. Can the gentleman give any information as to the degree to which the Public Health Service under this bill will be under the direction of the director of the veterans' bureau, so far as the care and attention of the men is concerned?

The director of the veterans' bureau is re-Mr. BARKLEY. quired to make regulations under which these men are to be hospitalized. Now the hospitals of the United States are put under the jurisdiction of the Public Health Service. We do not in this bill seek to rob the Public Health Service of the control of the hospital itself. Of course, when the men are placed there under orders of the director of the veterans' bureau they will be under the care, jurisdiction, and control of the Public Health Service, in so far as the actual hospitalization is concerned, subject to the regulations for the proper care of these men that may be made under the jurisdiction of the veterans' bureau. Now, the complaint heretofore has not been so much as to the treatment that the men have received after they got into the hospitals. The complaint has been that they were not properly placed there, or that the public-health examiners out over the country have not been as diligent as they might be in some cases in sending the examination papers to the bureau to be passed upon. But I do not recall that there has been any widespread complaint against the treatment these men have received after they have been placed in the hospitals under the jurisdiction of the Public Health Service. Has the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Sweer], who is the author of this bill, received any very widespread complaints as to the treatment of the men after they have been placed in the hospitals?

Mr. SWEET. I have not, after they have been admitted to

Mr. BARKLEY. The trouble has been heretofore the delay and the confusion and the uncertainty, after men made application for hospitalization, up to the time they were placed in the hospitals; and I think the Public Health Service is of such a character and I think it has stamped itself upon the Government of the United States as being of that character of efficiency, so far as the operation of the hospitals themselves is concerned, that there will be no complaint against the Public Health Service, so far as the treatment of these men is concerned, after they are placed in the Government hospitals.

Mr. MacGREGOR. When a man needs treatment he has not got to be examined by the examiner of the Public Health Service and wait months and months before he gets into the hospital?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Public Health Service does not get control of him or have anything to do with his examination until after he is put in the hospital by the veterans' bureau.

Mr. SWEET. Not until after his assignment to the hospital by the veterans' bureau.

Mr. BARKLEY. All the preliminary steps are taken by the new veterans' bureau, and the Public Health Service comes into play after the man has been assigned by the bureau to a particular hospital for treatment.

Mr. SWEET. And right in that connection, the new veterans' bureau follows up the matter by way of inspection, and if the man does not receive proper treatment the veterans' bureau has the right to take that man and place him in some other hospital and give him the treatment to which he is justly entitled.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. Mr. KINDRED. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to say that I have had unusual facilities to investigate personally the wonderfully efficient work of the Public Health Service, and I not only wish to indorse unqualifiedly what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has said with reference to the admirable achievements of this service, but I wish to ask if it is not true that the Public Health Service has laid the foundation for any development of this work which may take place in the future?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think that is correct.
Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachu-

Mr. ROGERS. Along the line of the inquiries that the gentleman has just been dealing with, I have read section 4 to mean that all present public hospitals would be transferred bodily to the veterans' bureau, and that after that transfer had been completed and patients assigned to those hospitals the care and treatment of the occupants would in all respects be under the control of the veterans' bureau and its staff. Am I incorrect in that?

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman is not correct about that. It is not the object of the bill to attempt to turn over bodily the physical property of the hospitals.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman will observe that the language

All property and equipment, including leases, contracts, and other obligations of the United States Public Health Service, are hereby transferred to and made a part of the veterans' bureau under the control, management, and operation of the director.

Mr. BARKLEY. The part of the language that applies to the Public Health Service is described in the order issued by the Secretary of the Treasury April 19, 1921. It is only that language included in the order of the Secretary.

There is one other thing I desire to call attention to, and I ask not to be interrupted until I complete my statement about that. I think sooner or later the Congress will have to codify the laws with reference to the war-risk insurance and vocational train-If a soldier tries to find out what the law is as to warrisk insurance, he must read six different pamphlets embodying five or six amendments before he knows what the law is, and then he can not be certain but must consult the bureau and ask how it has been interpreted. The same is true about the voca-tional training laws. I think the committee that reported this bill and Congress will have in the very near future to bring in a bill to codify, unify, and consolidate all the laws on the statute books with respect to the treatment and care of the ex-service men, so that when a man desires to find out what his rights are he will not have to wade through the acts of several Congresses to find out what the law is.

Now, I want to take a few moments in reference to decentralization provided for in this bill. The great complaint which has come to all of us in the past has been that a man did not know whether his rights were to be passed upon by the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the Public Health Service, or the Vocational Board. They would write to one bureau and perhaps would not receive an answer for a month. They would write to another bureau and receive a reply saying it was not within their jurisdiction but within the jurisdiction of some other bureau. So I think that 75 per cent of the criticism which has been heaped upon the various functions and 75 per cent of the delays have been caused by this division of the service in Wash-

The time that was lost, the slack that was created by reason of the fact that men did not know where to apply for a remedy, and by reason of frequently applying to the wrong place and getting no information at all, or if they did get any it was wrong information, was what caused much of the complaint. So that the demand has been that the bureaus not only be consolidated in Washington but that they be decentralized out in the field. The reason that has been urged for that has been that there would be somebody in the field who would come in personal contact with the claimant, whether it be for hospitalization, compensation, insurance, or vocational training. We have provided in this bill for what the War Risk Insurance Bureau has asked for, what the American Legion has asked for, and what the organization of disabled soldiers has asked for-the decentralization creating 14 regional bureaus out in the field. We have given the regional officers power to act finally upon all kinds of claims. If there is an office in Cincinnati it may act finally on every claim for compensation, insurance, or vocational training or for hospitalization. Of course, it is not intended that the office here in Washington shall become merely a bureau for the purpose of preserving the papers. The law places on the director primary responsibility for enforcing the act. It makes the director primarily responsible for seeing that all the provisions for the rights of these ex-service men are granted to them under the law, and it provides also that the 14 regional offices shall have not only power to pass finally upon all claims but such other powers as may be delegated to them by the director here in the central office. There must be uniformity among the regional offices, and the regulations for the regional offices must be provided by the central office created in the city of Washington.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield to the gentleman.
Mr. MASON. The gentleman was speaking just now of the power of the regional offices. I am informed that the full committee struck out of the report from the subcommittee a provision whereby the regional offices would have the power to pass upon these applications for insurance, vocational education, and training, which seems to be very unsatisfactory to those in the association.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman is mistaken in one respect. The committee left with the regional offices full power to act finally in all cases, but it did eliminate from the bill as reported by the subcommittee a provision which gave the suboffices power to act finally on claims for compensation, insurance, and vocational training. I will say that the reason why that was eliminated was this: I think there is a mistaken idea about the speed that will be brought about by allowing suboffices to have final jurisdiction. If they have final jurisdiction, there is no reason for having regional offices, because if a suboffice can pass finally on a claim there is no reason why it could not be sent directly to the bureau in Washington. There would be no reason for delay in reporting to the regional office and have it lay there for a number of days or weeks and then have the regional office report to Washington before the man could be paid. Now, here we have left with the regional office full power to pass finally upon all these claims. I do not think anybody can contend successfully or wisely that every agent of the bureau who is sent out to examine a case and report about it, and every employee who may be in the field, should have the right to make a final award. If that was true, an examiner who goes to the home to find out some information as to the degree of disability would have the right to make an award on the spot. But all checks must be issued in Washington; no matter how many suboffices or regional offices you have, the checks will be issued in the city of Washington. The bill provides that the suboffices shall perform all the duties delegated to them by the director, except to make final awards of compensation, insurance, and vocational training. They can grant hospitalization and do any other thing that may be preliminary to the granting of compensation, insurance, or training.

Mr. MASON. This is a new question to me, and I have been approached upon the subject only this morning, but will it not really add to the delay and red tape that may be applied in delaying action on these cases?

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman has asked the question that has bothered a good many of us, and I am going to be frank to say that if every application for compensation or any other right that a man is entitled to must be passed on by a cumbersome suboffice, where there must be a board of experts, if they are given the right to pass finally, which will consider the evidence, and then there is delay in the suboffice, and it is passed up to the regional office for review, where there will have to be another board of experts to review it, and if it is to be delayed there and then sent to Washington before the man is paid, I think in all probability there will be more red tape created than we are undertaking to do away with in this bill: but what we are seeking to do is to have a force of men in the field who can come in close contact with these men, help them in advice, furnish them papers and forms of every kind, and assist them in filling them out, and then have the regional board in the particular section of the country empowered to pass on the claim, so that the man will know without needless delay that he is to receive either compensation, training, or hospitalization, as the case may be.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes,

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would suggest that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mason] probably obtained his information from a letter that was sent to the Members of Congress by the national commander, Mr. Galbraith, and it might be well to state that the national commander was inaccurate in his statement of the provisions of section 6, because there had been a tentative change made, and he got the language of the tentative change, and he does not state in his letter accurately the provisions of section 6.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not recall exactly the language of the letter.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The facts are that we limited the jurisdiction of the suboffices, and the jurisdiction of the regional office remains.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not quite accurate. We limited the jurisdiction of the suboffices in three instances. They can not make a final award for insurance, compensation, or vocational training, but they can act finally on hospitalization or any other thing that the director may delegate to them except these three things. It is my hope that that will work in the interest of speed. I think those who desire final action in all cases by these local suboffices will find that there would be more delay than under the bill as we have reported it, because I assume no one would confer upon every employee who happens to be in a suboffice or upon any examiner in the field the right to pass finally on these claims without having them reviewed somewhere. If they are to be reviewed anywhere, they ought to be reviewed in the regional office which has general supervision and jurisdiction over the suboffices within the particular regions, and I think that the creation of the suboffices with power to aid the men, with power to help them fill out their papers, to give them information and help, and come in close contact with them and make recommendations to the regional board, so that the regional board may act finally, will bring about more speed and satisfaction than any other system that we have been able to devise.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I quite agree with my colleague, but I think it ought to be called to the attention of the House that the letter of Mr. Galbraith inadvertently does not state the facts accurately

Mr. BARKLEY. I read the letter hurriedly this morning, and I want to say that I think Col. Galbraith is acting in entire good faith.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am sure he is. Mr. BARKLEY. When the Wason bill was passed in the last Congress, providing for regional and suboffices, there was no such jurisdiction conferred upon the suboffices as that of passing finally on all claims, and at that time that provision was not requested. I remember the testimony of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and all of the men who came before our committee, urging the decentralization system, the creation of 14 regional offices, and suboffices, and the belief was that it afforded an agency that would come in direct contact with the men and would do away with the unnecessary delay caused by mistakes made that were sent into Washington, which had to be sent back to the men, to be corrected, before they could have their claims passed upon.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Is there a right of appeal from these regional offices to Washington?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. Every man who has been given compensation, hospitalization, or vocational training, and every man who has been refused either of these benefits, can appeal his case to the director in Washington.

Mr. MacGREGOR. I think we want somebody here, where we can get him by the neck, and not have him away off in New York or some other place.

Mr. BARKLEY. Otherwise you would have 14 different standards of compensation in the various districts. There must be a uniform system, and it will be operated under general rules and regulations that will be promulgated by the director in Washington.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. Mr. McKENZIE. I am satisfied that every man in the House is in sympathy with the purpose of the committee in trying to get speedy action, but I question very much whether we will get it by this system of decentralization unless there is some direction to the director to detail men from the office here who have had experience to the various substations. If we are going to continue the force that we have down here now, that is partially trained, and then create 14 additional offices and fill those offices with untrained men and women, I can see where the soldier will not get any relief.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would say to the gentleman that this bill gives the director carte blanche, so far as that is concerned. The personnel of the present bureau is turned over to the new bureau, and he is not limited in this bill as to the number of employees or as to the skill of the employees or as to the compensation which he is to pay them. We have given him absolute jurisdiction over the employment of experts and the employees of the bureau, and also have given him authority to fix their compensation.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman will permit, it seems to me that the Members of Congress who have had the experience which we have had in the past are quite competent to direct the director, no matter how great a man he may be, to use some of the men who have had experience.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know whether we could direct him to use Bill Jones by name in this bill, but he has the power to use Bill Jones if Bill Jones is a good man, or the power to fire him if he is a bad man. There are no doubt a lot of men and women who ought to be kept and no doubt there are a number who ought to be done away with, and the director will have absolute authority in respect to that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I spent four days on the passage of the war risk act.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman spent it very ably and it was of great advantage.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. What I want to ask it this: can see the absolute advantage of the field force in getting information, but what advantage is there, after the field force have the information, in not sending it to the department here in Washington and having all the regional departments, if you please, right here where we can get at them?

Mr. BARKLEY. The proposed advantage of that is this The regional office will be in close contact with all of the field men gathering information. When they have gathered the information they can send it to the regional office more rapidly than to Washington.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. How? Does not the mail come here as quickly as anywhere else?

Mr. BARKLEY. What we are trying to do is to humanize the service and bring the official functions of the Government into as close personal contact with the men as possible.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. When you have done that, have not you taken away close personal contact from all inquiry by the Member of Congress so that when he asks some-thing about any case he is told, "Wait until we get a report from the regional office"?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think probably there will be more delay on the part of the Member of Congress obtaining information in a given case, but only about one out of every thousand cases is ever brought to our attention; and all the other nine hundred and ninety-nine are expedited by reason of this

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will it speed it up when every final award will have to be sent to Washington and reviewed

Mr. BARKLEY. There will be no review, except the award will be sent here for the purpose of payment and to keep the record of the files in Washington. The man will be notified of the award there from the regional office.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I am sure the gentleman has studied this bill. I find now they are distributing these tubercular soldiers throughout the West, and orders come for them to be transferred to some other place. Many of them in my district have flooded me with telegrams asking where under the terms of this bill the disposition of that matter will be. Is it in the director or is it put under the regional head of that division?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, of course it will be under the general direction of the director under the regional office in that section That is, they will have the power under regulaof the country. tions from the director here to take this man out of one hospital and put him in another if they see fit. The subofficers can do that because they will have jurisdiction to grant hospitalization. In other words the suboffice in the State of Texas—there might be more than one-but, however many there may be, they will have jurisdiction finally to pass upon the cases of hospitalization, and they can remove a man from one place to another, If they think he does not receive the kind of treatment in one place they can send him somewhere else.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will their decision be final in the matter? Mr. BARKLEY. If the soldier is dissatisfied he can appeal to the regional office, and if he is dissatisfied with that he can appeal to the director here in Washington.

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield.

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Sanders] a few moments ago stated that Mr. Galbraith was inaccurate in his reference to an amendment to section 6 of the present bill. I have Mr. Galbraith's letter before me, and it makes this statement, "except to make compensation and insurance awards and grant vocational training." I will say to the gentleman that these are the exact words that appear in section 6 of the pending

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. Mr. RHODES. In fact it would appear when you divest the field office of the authority to do these three things there would not be much left for it to do.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not care to get into a controversy as to the interpretation of the letter of Mr. Galbraith. I have not compared his letter with section 6 of the various bills. But I am sure if he has made any inaccurate reference as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Sanders] contends, it was uninten-

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will permit, I took the trouble this morning to compare the section which Mr. Galbraith suggests in his letter with the section in here. It is not the same section. Mr. Galbraith is in entire good faith with regard to the matter because the section as it appeared at one time when we were working on it was the one given to him. It appeared in H. R. 3, a bill introduced by Mr. Sweet.
Mr. BARKLEY. That is in reference to House bill No. 3, which was the original bill introduced by the gentleman from Iowa at the beginning of this session.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. But does the letter refer

Mr. RHODES. The language as referred to by the gentleman from Indiana is correctly stated.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think perhaps everybody will be able to interpret Mr. Galbraith's letter.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Inasmuch as this is a question of accuracy, I would like to be accurate.

Mr. RHODES. I have both the letter and section before me. Mr. Galbraith does not object to section 6 as it appears in the original bill No. 3, and neither does he object to that portion of section 6 in the present bill, but he objects to the amendment which has been added to section 6, which divests the field office of the very thing which of necessity it should do.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Barkley] will not be impatient, because I want to get this straightened out at the present time.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will not, but I fear the House may become impatient because of my taking so much time. I yield to the gentleman. I hope the gentleman will go ahead.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It is only for the sake of accu-And if the gentleman will be kind enough to look at the present bill, H. R. 6611, while I read, I think he will see that it is not accurately reported. Here is the language in the letter.

Mr. RHODES. I have it before me.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Look at the bill. I will read the language of his letter:

That the director shall establish a central office in Washington, D. C., and not more than 14 regional offices and such suboffices within the territory of the United States and its outlying possessions as may be deemed necessary by him and in the best interests of the work committed to the veterans' bureau and to carry out the purposes of this act.

Mr. RHODES. That is all right,

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is not what I am asking the gentleman. The language of the letter is not the same as the language of the bill.

Mr. RHODES. And Mr. Galbraith has not quoted that language as a matter of objection, but he says he is in favor of that language and objects to the following language.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. But what I am saying is this, that Mr. Galbraith in his letter quotes section 6 in full, and he does not quote section 6 as it appears in the bill under consideration, but as it appeared in H. R. 3, which is not here. gentleman agrees with me that the language which I read from the letter is not the language that is in the bill?

Mr. RHODES. Does the gentleman agree with me? Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman agree with that proposition?

Mr. RHODES. That portion of it? Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. RHODES. I agree with it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And he further goes on with this

Any such regional office or suboffice may exercise such powers, includ-g the establishment of agencies for hearing complaints and for examining, rating-

Is the gentleman following the bill?

Mr. RHODES. Yes: I have it before me.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And it goes on to say:

and awarding compensation claims; granting medical, surgical, dental, and hospital care, convalescent care, insurance awards, pension awards, and all other matters delegated to these agencies by the director as could be performed lawfully under this act by the central office.

The gentleman does not contend that the language I have read from the Galbraith letter is the same language in the bill?

Mr. RHODES. Not the same identical language.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I merely said this, that Mr. Galbraith's quotation of this was inadvertently inaccurate. I did not mean to cast any reflection on it at all. He was here when we had in the bill what appeared in his letter, and we changed it, and the only difference now is in the suboffices, in that we limit them to 50 and limit their jurisdiction. The regional offices are given the jurisdiction that Mr. Galbraith wants. do not contend that the bill complies with his wishes. It may not. It limits the jurisdiction of the suboffices. They do not pass finally on three different matters. I just wanted to make myself clear.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I think that is substantially correct. Mr. RHODES. The three particular things the gentleman mentions are the things that ought to be left in the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Personally I think it fair to Mr. Galbraith to say that he feels that the suboffices should have final jurisdiction in all cases if the director delegates it to them. what he undertakes to set forth in his letter.

Mr. RHODES. That is correct.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. That is what I wanted to bring out in order to elucidate this matter, because Col. Taylor was talking with me over the telephone this morning.

Mr. BARKLEY. The confusion arises through this fact: At the beginning of this Congress the gentleman from Iowa introduced a bill known as H. R. 3. That is the bill, I think, that Mr. Galbraith refers to in discussing section 6. Later on he introduced another bill, H. R. 6047, which was the result of the deliberations of the subcommittee. Now, this bill that we are considering is the third bill, and which is the bill reported by the full committee.

I apologize to the Members of the House for taking so much time. I am sure that there will be no serious opposition to this measure as a whole, and I express the hope which the committee entertains that after it is enacted and is in operation there will be no just cause for complaint against the new agency which we set up to minister to the needs of all the exservice men who may come within its provisions. This much they are entitled to as a matter of right. We can not do less without failing to meet the requirements of the people and of a just and honorable Government. [Applause.]

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from

New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I doubt if there are any measures now pending in Congress more worthy of enactment, or more deserving in purpose, than the bill now under consideration providing for the centralization under one responsible head of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the rehabilitation division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and that portion of the Public Health Service which deals with the ex-service

At the outset let me quote from Col. Cholmeley-Jones in his report to the Secretary of the Treasury on this matter:

Experience has demonstrated very clearly that it is unsatisfactory to the ex-service men and women, and to the Government alike, to separately administer several distinct services to ex-service men and women. Beyond all question it would be to the mutual advantage of the Government and to its beneficiaries if Congress would consolidate all Federal agencies dealing with ex-service men and women, centralizing responsible authority, appropriations, and disbursements.

I will not review the obligation of the Federal Government to those men and women who formed that vast Army of vicpatriotic Americans, who rendered service at the hour of their Nation's need; neither will I recount the deeds of heroism and sacrifice made by them in defense of flag and The history of their achievements is an inspiration and a heritage for those who follow after. They have done their part. It is for us now to do ours. The pledge we made these men was the promise that the disabled and the dependents of those who laid down their lives should be cared for properly and generously. That was the intention of Congress; that was the intention of the American people. It was not to be an act of charity; God forbid that this great Nation will ever feel for a come a decrease in the number of patients in our military hos-moment that its defenders are to be considered from that standpoint. These men ask not for alms, but for justice: not for sympathy but for the fulfillment of an agreement, and if men and women ever deserved the gratitude and the generous consideration of our Republic these men and women

Abraham Lincoln touched the true note in his second inaugural address when he spoke of the obligation due those who had borne the shock of the conflict. In that great document he

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the Nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and a lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

When that utterance was delivered the Civil War was drawing to a close, and Lincoln with prophetic wisdom saw clearly the problems that awaited the disabled veterans and those dependent upon them. Now, more than two years after the termination of another great conflict, we are confronted with problems relating to the service men of this war.

It was and is the purpose of the Federal Government to provide amply for these men. Laws were enacted to carry out this expressed desire, and money was appropriated, but it is evident that the machinery set up to carry out the will of the people is not running smoothly, and therefore should be over-hauled, repaired, or replaced. There has been no controversy hauled, repaired, or replaced. over the fact that the most complete assistance should be granted the disabled and the diseased veterans. Everyone with a heart in his breast, every true American who appreciates valor and sacrifices, agrees to that proposition. The complaints which have been made have not been uttered against the laws passed by Congress for the relief of the disabled ex-service men, nor directed against any neglect of Congress to pass proper laws, but they have been leveled against the manner in which the laws have been carried out and the agencies administered. The delays in making allotments and in adjusting allowance, compensation, and insurance claims have been caused largely by too much red tape and too broad a division of authority.

Testimony discloses that the bureaus created for the benefit of the ex-service men have not functioned properly, and it is the hope and belief of those who are familiar with the subject that under the operation of the veterans' bureau the disabled ex-service men of the country will receive a more expeditious handling and careful consideration of their claims; that they will receive better care, hospitalization, and vocational training.

At a convention of the American Legion, held in Cleveland last September, the following recommendation was passed:

As the work of the Government agencies was being reviewed by our committee and the resolutions presented were being considered, the thought which impressed itself most upon the minds of the committee was the necessity of unifying the efforts of all agencies dealing with the welfare of the disabled ex-service persons. Duplication of effort by Government agencies, differences of opinion, pride of accomplishment, and at times misunderstanding, without one head passing final judgment, is detrimental to the best interests of the ex-service man whom the Government is trying to help. We can not conceive of a greater accomplishment for the American Legion than the securing of the passage of a law which will unify the efforts of all of the governmental

The bill now under consideration seeks to relieve the situation by accomplishing the following purposes:

1. The consolidation of the Government agencies which have to do with the disabled veterans into one bureau in the Department of the Treasury. This means the War Risk Insurance Bureau, which looks after the compensation of the disabled; the Federal Board for Vocational Education, which seeks to train the disabled to play their parts in the workaday world again; and the Public Health Service, which looks after the ills of these men.

2. The erection of sufficient hospitals to care for the men who need medical attention.

3. The enactment of legislation providing for the establishment of 14 regional branches of the new central bureau and as many suboffices, not exceeding 50, as may be needed. It makes possible the payment of premiums on the Government insurance through any post office and relieves from the payment of pre-miums on their Government insurance all disabled men in hospitals or taking vocational training and all disabled men temporarily unable to follow any gainful occupation. The bill also extends the time in which ex-service men who have less than 10 per cent disability may apply for hospital treatment from one year after discharge to one year after the passage of the act.

The impression was prevalent that with demobilization would pitals, but from facts disclosed the tide is evidently running in the opposite direction, and it is predicted that in the very near future there will be 30,000 men, or perhaps 50,000 men, who will need medical attention. The problem of caring for the former service man during the next decade, at least, is one that instead of subsiding will grow with years, for it is estimated that the peak will not be reached until 1926. Comparisons are both interesting and useful, and what has occurred in the past is frequently an index of what may be expected in the future. For the 2,400,000 men who served in the Union Army during the Civil War 579,115 invalid claims were allowed in the 36 years following that conflict. If the ratio holds good for the 4,764,071 veterans of the recent war, then by 1954, 1,200,000 claims for disabled veterans should be granted these younger veterans

On January 1, 1921, the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service stated that there were 19,019 disabled ex-service men under treatment as patients of the Bureau of War Risk Insur-He stated that 10,000 additional beds in hospitals are urgently needed for the care of tubercular and mental diseases. Owing to the lack of hospital facilities service men have been placed in State insane asylums in wards with the criminal and pauper insane. Others have been sent to county institutions for the poor, while others have been sent to crowded private institutions. These conditions must be corrected at once and additional hospitals must be provided. I desire to quote an interesting statement made recently by Dr. Salmon before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which is illuminating and should correct certain unfortunate and unfounded impressions:

There is an impression in some quarters that a great horde of exservice men, some of them seriously sick and some of them slightly sick, are throwing themselves upon the Government to receive the hospital care or compensation, or both. I think every person in this room will be surprised to know the actual proportion of the 4,600,000 discharged ex-service men who are now receiving treatment in any kind of Government hospital or in any hospital at Government expense is just 1 to 230 of that great army of men. In France on the day of the armistice 1 man in 10 of the whole American Expeditionary Forces was in a hospital. At Harvard University to-day 1 man in 50, either in his room or in hospital, is cared for by doctors and nurses. So this army of ex-soldiers, far from throwing themselves upon the Government in great numbers, are for the most part finding their treatment elsewhere.

Realizing the scope of the problem that confronts us we must rehearse certain facts and figures. Figures are dry reading but they sometimes tell graphic tales. For instance, 641,000 men who donned the uniform of the United States during the war hold discharges which indicate various degrees of disability. Already 268,802 of these men have been judged 10 per cent or more disabled and entitled to compensation under the war risk insurance act. More than 125,000 of them have been pronounced vocationally handicapped, and 60,000 of them are re-ceiving vocational training from the Government.

It is estimated that 80,000 men with disabilities traceable to their service have asked and received hospital treatment from the Government. It is said that 5,000 enter the hospitals every month, against 3,500 who leave the hospitals—an increase of 1,500 men seeking hospital treatment every 30 days.

The disabilities of the men have been classified to a considerable extent. Of the 641,000 discharged with disabilities, 46,310 have been classed as tubercular, 76,588 as mental and nervous cases, 75,000 as surgical, 62,869 as eye, ear, nose, and throat cases, 22,847 as miscellaneous, and 229,388 as medical. The rest have not been classified.

I will not recount the tragic cases that have come under my personal notice where neglect, indifference, or delay has caused hardship and suffering. I regret to say that they have been numerous, and bitterness and resentment has naturally resulted. At least half the work of my office is devoted to straightening out the tangles and delays which have worked against the exservice men. It is a pleasure for me to do what I can for these veterans, and from my own personal knowledge I am convinced that there is serious need of readjustment, and therefore, Mr. Chairman, I give my indorsement to the bill now under consideration.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Robsion].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, at this point I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, I have listened closely to a reported this bill, who have explained this bill in detail. The committee has given months of patient effort and investigation to this measure. This bill as a whole, I am sure, represents in a general way the combined best thought of the men who represent the ex-service men of the World War-the officers who have been administering the laws relating to the hospitalization, compensation, and insurance and the rehabilitation of the exservice men-as well as the best thought of this committee and many persons interested in the ex-service men, who appeared before the committee and testified. While the bill may not be perfect, yet we feel that it will mean a great improvement in the service rendered to the soldiers. I favor the bill, but I should also like to see some two or three amendments adopted when the bill is taken up for the consideration of amendments. I favor amending section 6 as suggested by Col. Galbraith, jr., national commander of the American Legion, and shall support a further amendment which proposes to cut out that section giving the right to hospital officers or others to take away as much as three-fourths of the compensation awarded to a soldier for the infraction of any of the rules of the hospital. This clause should be cut out. We have no right to take away the compensation of any soldier for merely disobeying some rules of a hospital.

I wish to congratulate Mr. Sweet and other members of his committee for their great service to the soldiers in this measure. Under the existing laws the work of hospitalization, compensation, and the vocational training and rehabilitation of disabled World War soldiers is under separate bureaus or departments. This has led to much confusion, delay, and injustice to This bill consolidates all of the Government's acthese boys. tivities in behalf of the World War soldier under what is termed a veterans' bureau in the Treasury Department. The head of this bureau will be an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

While the disabled soldiers and their dependents have met with many hardships and delays in securing their rights, the Congress has felt all along that the country owes to these boys a debt of gratitude which can not be fully repaid. We are all proud of their services, and Congress has from time to time without stint provided funds and means to aid our boys in such a way as the soldiers of no other war in our country have been cared for, and going far beyond the aid given to the disabled soldiers of any country engaged in the World War. stance, for allotments and allowances, compensation, and insurance the Government has paid out under appropriation of Congress up to March 31, 1921, more than $700,000,000, and the Congress has appropriated and provided for allowances, allotments, compensation, hospitalization, vocational training up to March 31, 1921, $1,454,877,507.49; but with this staggering sum we find thousands of soldiers who have not been provided with adequate hospital treatment and thousands of worthy soldiers who have not yet received compensation and many thousands of other soldiers who have not been admitted to vocational train-

There has been a falling down in the Public Health Service, in the Bureau of War Risk, and the Board for Vocational Training. Adequate funds have been provided by Congress. We feel that the fault lies largely with those administering the law. Of course, the fact that all of these activities have been more or less separated must account for some of the delay. bill will consolidate all of these activities, make for efficiency, and give quicker and better service to the soldiers. It must be the earnest desire of every loyal American to see adequate hospital treatment provided and given to every disabled soldier who needs it and desires it, and that compensation be awarded without stint to every boy who suffered injury or contracted a disability in the service, and that, if he desires, he be given opportunity at once to take vocational training that he may rehabilitate himself. I am for this bill because I feel that it will bring about this happy state of affairs.

HEART AS WELL AS HEAD SHOULD FUNCTION

In a very brief period of time we demobilized about 4,000,000 men. About 600,000 of these soldiers were discharged having some character or other of disability. Their certificates of dis-charge show this. Thousands of others whose certificates of discharge make no mention of disabilities were in fact at the time disabled. Many of them, in order to get out, stated and had the surgeon state that they were in good health and all right. Their certificates of discharge state that they were in good health at the time of discharge. Thousands of others appeared to be in good health at the time of their discharge, but the seed of disease had been planted in their system, and after reaching home they find themselves developing rheumatism, number of splendid speeches by members of the committee that luberculosis, or many other forms of disease. In the beginning the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was liberal enough in practically all of the cases. We were just coming out of war and still had the war spell of gratitude upon us. I am afraid that we are becoming sensitive on the question of expenses and taxes and perhaps more or less "hard boiled."

I sometimes feel that the rules and regulations established by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance have been made too exacting. It is too difficult for a disabled soldier to prove his case. He is often required to furnish the affidavits of comrades, whose names or present whereabouts are unknown to him. He can not furnish these, and his claim is denied. I think the Government should secure such information if it is necessary, because the Government has the names of all of the persons with whom the soldier served and has the means to locate them and get this information. Again, we find many of the decisions of the Bureau of War Risk denying compensation for many important disabilities, claiming that the soldier had the disability before he entered the service. Every soldier was examined several times before he was finally accepted. After the Government accepted him as a sound, able-bodied man and put him into hard service it should be estopped from claiming that the boy was disabled at the time he entered the service. If he was reported sound at the time he entered the service and came out disabled or now has a disability that can be shown with reasonable clearness to have originated in the service, he should be awarded compensation. We are advised by persons connected with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance that the claims of about 7 men out of 10 are being rejected.

About 650,000 have filed claims. Something like 300,000 have been awarded compensation, about 200,000 have been denied compensation, and about 100,000 claims have not been passed upon. Hair-splitting technicalities should not be employed in passing on these claims. The hard-and-fast rules of insurance companies used in adjusting claims should find no place in passing upon the claims of the disabled soldiers. The doubt should be resolved in favor of the soldiers.

The people of the United States will never be able to fully repay the debt of gratitude to these disabled heroes, and in passing on disabled soldiers' cases for compensation, hospital treatment, or vocational training the heart'should be permitted to function freely as well as the mind. A broad humanity, generous sympathy, and a deep feeling of gratitude should be in the mind and heart of every man and woman who undertakes to administer these laws for these disabled boys. There has been too much delay. We have positive evidence of many disabled soldiers who have become insane or who have taken their own lives while striving to break through the endless red tape separating them from the benefits that the Congress has provided for them.

THE MONEY MUST GO TO THE SOLDIERS.

Our Committee on Education more than a year ago investigated by resolution of Congress the Federal board as it relates to vocational training and rehabilitation of disabled soldiers. That investigation covered several weeks. We had before our committee perhaps more than 100 witnesses, men and women in every walk of life. Although Congress had appropriated millions to rehabilitate our disabled boys, I was astounded to learn that our disabled boys were in a measure depending upon the Elks, the Red Cross, and similar institutions to take care of them through the long delay in getting action on their cases. We found in that board a man issuing what is known as the "hard-boiled" order. He has given instructions to his sub-ordinates, in passing on the disabled soldiers' cases, to not permit the heart to function, but for the head alone to function. Under such instructions and directions many disabled soldiers were denied their rights. In our opinion every charge that had been made against the board was fully sustained.

I believed then and believe now that the men at the head of the Vocational Education Board have never sensed this great problem, and I feel sure that if you read all of the testimony, including the men at the head of that board, you will also be convinced of that fact. The board was inefficient, extravagant, and had grossly neglected the disabled soldiers.

Gentlemen of the House, do you realize when the 1st of July, 1921, comes we shall have appropriated and expended to rehabilitate by giving vocational training to the disabled soldiers of this country $145,000,000? What has been the result? I am strong for rehabilitation. The first speech I made on the floor of this House was in support of a bill reported to the House by our Committee on Education increasing the pay to $80 per month for single men and $100 per month with allowance for de-pendents for married men while taking this training, and later on our committee reported a bill, and I voted for the amendment that increased this sum, allowing single men $100 per month and married men $120 per month, with additional allowance for their dependents, while taking the training. I said two years ago that, in my judgment, one of the very greatest thoughts of the century was the purpose of America to reclaim and rehabilitate her disabled soldiers.

THE BENEFITS OF THIS LAW SHOULD BE ENLARGED AND EXTENDED.

The present law provides that no disabled soldier may receive the benefits of this law unless his disability incurred in the service or aggravated by the service amounts to a vocational handicap. If it does, he is entitled to what is known as section 2 training—that is, he will receive pay while taking the training-but if it does not, he can only receive section 3 training; that is, the books and tuition, and so forth. Now, I am in favor of wiping out the distinction between section 2 and section 3 training and give training with pay for all disabled soldiers now entitled to receive section 2 and section 3 training. But what have we done with the $145,000,000? We began this work about three years ago.

Only about half of the men entitled to section 2 training have been placed for training and are now in training. About 72,000 are taking training under section 2, with pay, and about 10,000 are taking training under section 3, without pay. Of course, the purpose of appropriating and spending this one hundred and forty-five million during the past three years was to educate and train in some trade or vocation the disabled soldiers. Now, what has this board accomplished? On page 101 of the hearings on the second deficiency appropriation bill we find this statement, issued by Mr. Uel W. Lamkin, director, on May 4, 1921:

It is the opinion of us who are familiar with the situation there are approximately 3,000 men gone into employment on account of their training and are, therefore, rehabilitated, although the definite reports are not yet in the central office of Washington, and so were not included in this statement.

It is claimed in other statements from the board that something like 3,000 men have been rehabilitated. Mr. Lamkin merely expresses the opinion that approximately 3,000 men have gone into employment on account of their training and are, therefore, rehabilitated. He does not state that 3,000 men have been rehabilitated and have therefore gone into employment. One hundred and forty-five million dollars spent and merely expressing an opinion. After three years of effort to rehabilitate perhaps 3,000 men have been trained. That means about $45,000 for every soldier that is turned out trained. Of course, other soldiers are taking the training.

What was spent in April, 1921, for this work? Something like $11,000,000. Less than $8,000,000 of this sum was paid to the boys. About three millions were used up for salaries and other expenses.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman is mistaken; the overhead expense is only 7 per cent.

Mr. ROBSION. I have heard that, but that is not true. Laughter.] Listen to this: On page 108 of these hearings, Mr. Lamkin stated that the training pay roll for the last half of April, 1921, was about $4,000,000. Double that and it makes eight million, and the greater part of the balance of the eleven million for April goes to take care of employees. We have spent and will spend by the 1st of July one hundred and fortyfive million, and we have provided $120,000,000 for this work for next year, making $265,000,000 in all, and it is the belief of many well-informed persons that this work of rehabilitation for our disabled soldiers will in all amount to as much as $1,000,000,000 before it is concluded.

$7,500 TO $10,000 PER DISABLED MAN.

You mark what I say, that if this work is continued to be carried on as at present, that this Government could give every disabled soldier who completes this training from $7,500 to $10,000 in cash, and then more soldiers would get this sum of money than soldiers will be rehabilitated under the law as administered by the present board. What I mean to say is that the Government could save money by paying each soldier who will be rehabilitated under this board $7,500 to $10,000 in cash, rather than have him rehabilitated in the way and manner the work is carried on, and then save money, because in that event the soldier would get the money and it would not go to an army of civilian employees or to schools and institutions which I shall refer to, and it would be better for the soldiers.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. ROBSION. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. My friend says it means $45,000 per soldier.

Mr. ROBSION. No; I did not say that. I said if they are correct in their opinion that 3,000 soldiers have been fully rehabilitated, then, so far as the number who have been rehabilitated are concerned, the Government has spent $45,000 for each soldier who has been rehabilitated. We all know that other soldiers are in training.

Mr, FESS. I am sure that my friend does not want to leave a wrong impression. Mr. ROBSION. Certainly not.

Mr. FESS. There are in training now 80,000, in round numbers, and there are a little over 3,000 who have gone out and completed the training. Mr. ROBSION. The gentleman has no authority for making the statement that they have been completely trained.

Mr. FESS. This law was signed in June, 1918. It was not in operation until late in the fall of that year, and it takes two years to train a man. Does the gentleman think it is proper to make the statement that it costs $45,000 per soldier, when most of them are yet in training?

Mr. ROBSION. Has not the gentleman heard my statement? Mr. FESS. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I just came in.

Mr. ROBSION. The gentleman has no authority for saying that 3,000 men have been trained and rehabilitated. Mr. Lamkin himself says that, in his opinion, 3,000 have quit and gone into employment and therefore are rehabilitated.

Mr. FESS. Over 7,000 have finished their work, and 3,000 have quit the work before they finished.

Mr. ROBSION. The gentleman from Ohio is undertaking to give figures as to the men who are rehabilitated. Mr. Lamkin says they have not got them in the central office.

Mr. FESS. Does my friend want this House and the country to believe that there have not been more than 3,000 soldiers

Mr. ROBSION. I do not think there have been 3,000 men trained. In going through my district and over the country I have been deeply interested in this problem, and I have never yet run across a disabled soldier who has been rehabilitated by this board. If the gentleman from Ohio has run across any such disabled soldier, I want him to state his name and give his place of residence.

Mr. SWEET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. In the statement made by Mr. Lamkin on March 31, 1921, he said:

On March 15, 3,123 men are reported as completed training and 7,307 as having been discontinued. Approximately 50 per cent of the latter have entered employment as a result of training. These are in addition to the 3,123 definitely reported as rahabilitated or completed. Seven hundred and twenty-three have died while in training.

Mr. ROBSION. The gentleman has his figures crossed. has been my experience when you undertake to reconcile the figures and reports given out by the Federal board you find yourself in a maze of confusion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ROBSION. I do not want to yield all of my time.
Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to use it all, but I do not want the gentleman to make a mistake. Mr. Lamkin told me that the number who had completed training on May 1 was 3,562. The number who have discontinued training is 3,565, and the number who had their training interrupted was 7,994. There are now in training under section 2, 72,000, and under 10,000, making 82,000 in all.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Fess, Mr. Sweet, and yourself have all interrupted me and have given statements issued by Mr. Lamkin, and it seems to me that he has given each one of you a different set of figures. I stated if you relied upon the figures issued by this board you would find yourself in a wilderness and maze of confusion. The gentleman represents a great district in Kentucky, where there are many disabled soldiers. Does he know of one soldier in his district that has been rehabilitated? If he does, give his name and post-office address, and if any Member on the floor of this House knows of any soldier who has been rehabilitated, although we have spent $145,000,000, I should like to have his name and post-office address

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not been traveling around down there to find out.

Mr. ROBSION. I have been, and I am now deeply concerned to know if any disabled soldier in my district or elsewhere has been rehabilitated, and I would like to have this Federal board furnish Congress with a list of names and post-office addresses of persons whom they claim to have rehabilitated.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know if any of them have completed their training or not, but I know that scores of them from my district are getting the training and will finish soon,

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not my friend think one of the troubles about not knowing who have finished their training is that when they have finished they do not sit down and write to their Congressman?

Mr. ROBSION. I should think the Federal board would Under the law when the training stops the pay stops.

Mr. BARKLEY. You can get this information from Mr. Lamkin, if you ask for it.

Mr. ROBSION. In answering the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Barkley], if you think money has not been thrown out by the shovelful, I want to point out a few of the things which developed in our investigation of this Federal board. Over in Pittsburgh there was a school-teacher whose name was Boland. He got a contract from the Federal board to start a school for these disabled soldiers in Pittsburgh. He had no buildings and had no equipment, but he got a contract from the Federal board, in which they agreed to furnish to him 150 soldiers and pay him the tuition, $35 per month per man, and furnish all necessary supplies in addition to the tuition, and if they sent him over 150 soldiers he was to receive $30 per month for each. At the time of our investigation he had 500 of our soldier boys in his little school, and we were paying him $15,000 per month as tuition and furnishing the supplies. At that time we had soldier boys taking training in about 2,000 schools in the United States, but this school-teacher in Pittsburgh, with no school at all when he made the contract, had more students than any other school or great university in America.

The Government has placed about 75 of these disabled beys at the University of Kentucky, and about 48 of them at Berea Each of these schools have millions invested in buildings and equipment. Each school has a great corps of teachers. We paid the University of Kentucky $5 per month for tuition and Berea College $3.50 per month for tuition, but the schoolteacher in Pittsburgh had 500 of our boys at $30 per month. In our report of the investigation of this board we condemned the Boland contract, but I understand the board has continued it and has established similar private schools throughout the

· I AM FOR THE SOLDIERS.

We found that a certain Jew tailoring company in New York had assigned to it 30 disabled soldiers, and we paid to this tailoring company for so-called instruction $1,050 per month when the boys were doing ordinary work and were practically receiving no instruction. These things are going on all over The soldiers are not getting what they ought to the country. have out of these millions appropriated by Congress. not go too strong for me when it comes to appropriating money to help the soldiers. I want this vocational training law broadened so it will take in every soldier who has 10 per cent disability. I have been fighting all along for the bonus bill and shall continue to do so. I feel that Congress will not do its full duty toward the soldier until this bonus or adjusted pay bill is passed. I want the soldiers of America to get the benefit of this money.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. ROBSION. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know anything about the Boland school, but I want to ask about the universities and colleges the gentleman has mentioned. As a matter of fact, a man who enters one of these institutions has to be a graduate of a high

Mr. ROBSION. That depends on the work he takes.
Mr. RANKIN. Practically all of the institutions and practically every university in the United States requires that the applicant for entry be a graduate of a high school.

Mr. ROBSION. Yes; but these colleges and universities all over the country have been forming classes to take care of the soldier boys. We have about 80,000 boys going to school. Does not the gentleman think that arrangements could be made at these colleges and universities to give the boys instruction, rather than making arrangements with a school-teacher in Pittsburgh, who had no school or equipment at the time the contract was made?

Mr. RANKIN. I said I did not knew anything about the school-teacher in Pittsburgh, but if the board has arranged to establish schools that are fitted for the training of these boys, where they can go and start and move along together, I can not see anything wrong with that.

Mr. ROBSION. Certainly I want proper arrangements made to take care of the boys, but I want the arrangements made with the schools, colleges, and universities with ample equipment and an able corps of teachers, and where we can get the instruction at from $3.50 to $10 per month, instead of turning over an army of boys to a school-teacher in Pittsburgh with no school and pay him $30 per month per man and furnish the supplies for him.

Mr. RANKIN. I said I know nothing about the Boland school, but I do say that every man of ordinary intelligence knows that you can not jerk a man up because he was in the service and put him in any class and expect him to go on.

Mr. ROBSION. Out of these 80,000 that we are sending to school we could form classes, which has been done, of such sizes as might be proper in any of the schools or colleges of the country. I am objecting to paying these enormous sums to fellows like Boland when we could get better service for our soldiers at less than one-fifth the cost. The burden of my statement is, we have spent $145,000,000, and an army of office-holders and fellows like Boland are receiving too much of this money and too little of it is going to the soldiers.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman has not shown where there is anything wrong with any of these transactions, except the Boland school.

Mr. ROBSION. I have not had the time, and neither will I have the time; but I should like to know if the gentleman from Mississippi approves the Boland contract? This fellow Boland was receiving about $2,700 per year as a school-teacher in Pittsburgh, and under this contract he was receiving $15,000 per month as tuition and the Government furnishing the supplies. Boland made a nice little fortune in one year out of the money we appropriated for the soldiers.

Mr. RANKIN. I said I know nothing about the Pittsburgh school, but the gentleman is reflecting on these other schools without citing any facts to back it up.

A PART OF THE WILSON ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. ROBSION. This Federal board was appointed and kept in office, and are still in office, under the Wilson appointment. The present administration has not yet appointed men to take charge of this board and is not responsible for the conditions about which I have spoken. I call attention to these matters to show the necessity of the transfer of this department and to consolidate it under the Treasury Department, so the soldiers may get real service and the benefit of the money. President Harding appointed a commission which has rendered very valuable service to the soldiers in the Bureau of War Risk and the Public Health Service. New life has been given to both of these departments, and when all of these soldier activities are consolidated under this veterans' bureau, and the work is decentralized, and the benefits of these laws are brought home to the soldiers, we expect to see a large improvement in the service rendered to the soldiers, and, with this belief, I am for this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Rogers].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire at this time to bring to the attention of the members of the committee in charge of this measure an amendment, which I shall offer at the proper place in the bill when it is read for amendment under the five-minute rule. I know, as we all know, that it is not easy to get an amendment adopted to a bill of this kind without the sanction of the committee, and I desire, if I may prefer the request, that gentlemen on the committee will give this matter some attention, so that they may be prepared to accept it when the time comes.

Gentlemen will remember that it was just six months to a day after the declaration of war before the original war risk insurance law was enacted and became effective. In that period of six months there were 39 men who became totally and permanently disabled as a result of their war service. They have established the fact of total and permanent disability on the one hand and of service origin on the other.

Out of the hosts of men whom we sent forth into the war there are only 39 who were wholly incapacitated before the war risk insurance law became effective. Those men, of course, could not apply for insurance because Government insurance had not then been inaugurated. Congress in subsequent legislation recognized the unfairness of cutting off those men, when they had had no opportunity to apply for insurance, and provided that they should be entitled to automatic insurance at the rate of $25 a month. That is the equivalent of about $4,000 worth of insurance. This provision was certainly a step in the right direction, but my suggestion is that it was not sufficiently generous. My amendment will be to the effect that each of those $9 men, totally and permanently disabled, with a disability of service origin, be deemed entitled to automatic insurance in the sum of $10,000.

Why should we do that? Why should we give these soldiers this gratuity? Because every one of those men would almost certainly have applied for $10,000 of insurance if the law had then been effective, so as to permit their doing so. According to the figures in the World Almanac, there were 4,764,071 men enrolled in the American military service throughout the entire period of the war. According to the files of the War Risk Bureau, 4,631,993 actually took out insurance. In other words, over 97 per cent of all of the men in the military and naval service took out insurance. The presumption as to those 39 who went into the war early and who saw their duty among the first is that they would have taken out insurance if they had had the opportunity. Gentlemen are familiar with the additional fact as to the very large average amount of insurance that was taken out. The average insurance policy of our service men was just short of $9,000.

We may, without being very generous, presume that each of those 39 men would not only have taken out insurance but would have taken out a policy in the sum of $10,000. Therefore I hope that Congress, recognizing the needs of these brave men who went forth early and who were maimed for life, will give them the benefit of the protection now, in their misery, of $10,000 of insurance

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman tell the House the nature of these disabilities and how they were received, bearing in mind that the war risk act took effect just six months after we went into the war, on October 6, 1917.

Mr. ROGERS. It was six months after we entered the war before the war risk insurance act took effect. In the meantime we had sent many troops to France. At least three of the cases with which I am familiar among those 39 are men who were hopelessly and permanently injured as a result of the explosion of a bomb in their training area in France.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So that while the disability was due to service origin, it was not due to being in combat?

Mr. ROGERS. I think it was in October that our troops actually engaged in combat. That is my recollection about it. But, of course, the gentleman does not mean to distinguish between disability of service origin received in actual combat, on the one hand, and in the training area in France or in this country, on the other.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Oh, no. I offered the amendment which made this retroactive at the time we passed the Sweet amendment, two years ago.

Mr. ROGERS. So as to give automatic insurance in these cases?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Of course, I think that was a step in the right direction, and my quarrel at the moment is between giving the equivalent of $4,000 of automatic insurance instead of the $10,000, which it seems to me those men ought to have.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Of course, this is contract in-

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; but the gentleman's own amendment recognizes the propriety, as far as Congress can recognize the propriety, of giving automatic insurance in the cases of men who could not take out insurance because the law was not then in effect.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Was this presented to the committee at the hearings?

Mr. ROGERS. It was presented to the chairman of the subcommittee. Of course, I have no information whether he was able to present it either to the full committee or the subcommittee.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, of the numerous measures that have been brought before Congress in the way of legislation affecting the veterans of the World War, especially those who have been disabled, none can compare in importance with the bill we now have under consideration. As I understand this measure, it proposes to merge the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the Federal Board for Vocational Training, and the Rehabilitation Division of the Public Health Service into one bureau, to be known as the veterans' bureau.

I do not suppose there is a Member of this body who has not had scores of cases up with these several bureaus in behalf of soldiers who were disabled in the late war,

We have all become impressed with the necessity for consolidating the various bureaus which have to do with the rehabilitation of those who were wounded and crippled while serving their country. Handling matters for ex-soldiers who have been wounded and crippled is to-day a fine art. I am frank to confess I do not know all the necessary procedure to bring some of the cases that have been called to my attention to a settlement.

Some of my experiences with such cases have been almost heart-breaking. In trying to adjust them so that the applicant could either secure adequate compensation or vocational training, I have had to go from bureau to bureau, back and forth, like a shuttlecock. Where an adjustment should only have required a few days, or at the most two or three weeks, it has taken months. Papers and documents have become mislaid or actually lost, putting the applicants to unnecessary delay, expense, and mental anguish. This bill will correct the evils of the present system in a great measure. Its author has given much time and thought in its preparation, the committee has done likewise, and it is my sincere hope that it will speedily become a law.

I believe that there is a misapprehension in regard to this legislation existing in certain quarters. In this morning's mail I received a communication, as I presume all other Members of Congress did, from Col. F. W. Galbraith, jr., national com-mander of the American Legion. Among other things, Mr.

Galbraith says in his letter:

Extensive hearings have been held on this bill. Every witness appearing before the House committee urged decentralization of the activities so that the proposed veterans bureau might establish a well-organized regional and suboffice in personal contact with the claimants as near their source as practicable.

Mr. Galbraith quotes section 6 in full, and then goes on and Savs:

This section was reported favorably by the subcommittee but amended by the Committee of the Whole in the following language:
"Except to make compensation and insurance awards and grant vocational training."

Mr. FISH. Will the distinguished gentleman from Minne-

Mr. KNUTSON. I will yield to my good friend from New

Mr. FISH. The gentleman from Minnesota has referred to a letter of Col. Galbraith, and as that letter reads it implies that the regional boards have not been given the power to award compensation. This letter would confuse the minds of those Members of Congress who had not studied this question if they did not appreciate the fact that inadvertently Mr. Galbraith is referring to a different bill, and this particular bill does give full power to the regional boards. What Col. Galbraith is driving at is to give this same power to the substations. I imagine that is the personal opinion of Col. Galbraith. He does not state in this letter that it is the opinion of the American Legion. In the last few minutes I have taken occasion to ask a number of ex-service men whether they were in favor of giving this power to the substations, and all of them agreed that it would be a very dangerous power to hand out to men receiving salaries of between $1,500 and $2,000 and permit them thereby to make awards amounting to thousands of dollars, so I think we must take this letter as a personal letter and not as a letter representing the entire American Legion composed of over 2,000,000 men. The Republican whip [Mr. Knurson] has always taken a real and active interest in all measures for the welfare of ex-service men, and I am only too glad to cooperate with him.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am glad that the gentleman from New York has made that statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KNUTSON. I am sorry, but I have only get a minute or two remaining.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish] has a most distinguished war record. He stands high in the councils of the American Legion, and I am glad that he has taken it upon himself to explain the position of the American Legion on this proposition. It would be unfortunate if the contention of Col. Galbraith were to become generally accepted throughout the country as the proper one. I am satisfied that the bill H. R. 6611 is as good as it is possible to devise. bill shows a great deal of care and study on the part of the committee, and I know its passage will be hailed by every disabled, yes, every service man and every friend of the service man with delight and approbation. I yield back the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1837. An act to amend section 32 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act;

S. 1911. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6567) to amend section 407 of the transportation act of 1920.

VETERANS' BUREAU.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to discuss the question before the House without recognizing the services of the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. Sweet]. He has been uniformly courteous, untiringly industrious, and always able in his work. I believe Congress and the country should recognize his splendid service that is largely responsible for this bill

The legislation we have before us is founded upon the experience of the last three years as well as the changed conditions that have occurred since the original legislation was adopted. The war risk insurance act was adopted in October, 1917. At that time the men to whom it applied were in the Army and The importance of decentralization as a readily accessible. part of the system of soldier relief was not then necessary and was not recognized.

Eight months later, in June, 1918, the vocational education act, providing for vocational training, was passed, and the same condition existed at that time. The men to whom it applied were not scattered throughout 3,000,000 homes of this country, but were then practically all in the Army. They constituted a distinct group not then closely associated with the beneficiaries of the war risk insurance act. To a large extent the same was true as to the beneficiaries of the act of March 3, 1919, providing for medical and hospital care for the service men of the World War. Since those acts were originally passed we have had the advantage of much experience. Those measures blazed the trail of legislation, but now we legislate with the knowledge of practical experience. We have a better conception of the need and the magnitude of the soldier relief efforts to which our country is committed.

Let me call your attention to just a few brief facts tending to show the extent of that responsibility. The War Risk Bureau has dealt with 4,900,000 insurance applications and 600,000 compensation claims. One hundred and fifty thousand insurance claims have been presented. One hundred and nine-teen thousand men have passed through these hospitals. Seven hundred and seventy thousand medical examinations have been During the last six months there has been an average of 45,000 references for examination a month to the medical service. Ninety-two thousand men have entered medical training courses, and over $1,000,000,000 has been spent. And yet we are in the initial stages of this great effort of the United States to take care of its disabled ex-service men.

The dissatisfaction and partial failure that have attended the efforts of the Government to extend these relief measures to our disabled soldiers are matters of deep concern. This legislation is intended to remedy the errors that have been made, so far as that can be accomplished by legislation. But to-day I would call the attention of Congress to this fact: This bill affords only a partial remedy and can only partly eliminate complaints. To a large degree the complaints and the failures that have occurred are inherent in the situation. It has been utterly impossible, with the vast number of applications under these three service divisions of the Government for the last two or three years, for the work to be accomplished by hastily organized forces without much disappointment and much complaint. In the very nature of things there will always be much complaint. The Dawes Commission considered the unsatisfactory conditions which are proposed to be relieved by this bill. Among other things, the Dawes Commission states:

It can not be too strongly emphasized that the present deplorable failure on the part of the Government to properly care for the disabled veterans is due in large part to an imperfect organization of governmental effort. There is no one in control of the whole situation. Indemental effort. There is no one in control of the whole situation. Independent agencies, by mutual agreement, now endeavor to coordinate their action, but in such efforts the joint action is too often modified by minor considerations, and there is always lacking that complete cooperation which is incident to a powerful superimposed authority. No emergency of war itself was greater than is the emergency which confronts the Nation in its duty to care for those disabled in its service and now neglected.

4. Not unwillingness to serve or reluctance to cooperate, but divergent provisions of laws and limitations placed by legal decisions, have prevented effective coordination in these three respective services.

5. Limitations in the interest of presumed economy have been placed upon the authority of those responsible for these Government agencies in the employment of personnel, both as to number and quality. This has operated to the serious embarrassment of the various agencies engaged, in obtaining and retaining the quality of personnel upon which the efficiency of their departments depends.

6. Lack of provision for hospital construction to provide facilities commensurate with the proved and declared needs of the immediate future and for some years to come has been of such a degree as to prevent even the most willing cooperation among Government departments from providing hospital and medical care so distributed as to place and quality of service to accommodate the invalid wards of the Nation. It is clear that although additional beds in hospitals maintained by the several departments of the Government are available, complete use of them has not been possible by reason of certain fundamental limitations, chief of which is the lack of legal authority to secure adequate medical, nursing, and other hospital personnel.

This bill gives the director practically unlimited power to choose personnel and determine their salaries. In that way it is thought that by giving unlimited power and responsibility to the director we will lay the foundation on which a successful organization can be built. Later on, perhaps, Congress may properly want to make limitations on the personnel and expenditure of funds, such as now prevail as to other Government agencies. By refusing to make such limitations in the or-ganizing period of this new bureau we have sought to relieve Congress of the criticism heretofore directed against it, that by unreasonable restraints we have crippled the administration of soldier relief measures.

Three principal causes of complaint have been asserted against these soldier relief agencies. These charges are, first, delay in securing awards and payments; second, dissatisfaction with awards made; and third, insufficient and unsatisfactory hospital

At the present time, on the average, it takes 90 days from the time the application is filed until an award is made. There the time the application is filed until an award is made. is an inherent difficulty in this situation that legislation can not The practical situation is this: The soldier entirely remove. was disabled or sick. He thought his ailment due to the service. He went to his local physician, who perhaps referred him to the United States Government. He wrote to Washington for information. He received a letter and a copy of the law, which he did not understand. He wrote back for a blank application. Necessarily he must furnish proof to justify the Government payment he seeks. He filled out the application and made his When it reached Washington it was found incomplete and had to be returned for further revision. All the while mistakes and delays have occurred. He becomes disgusted and perhaps disheartened with the delay and details that Government practice has developed as "safeguards" to the spending of public money. To him these alleged safeguards become unnecessary "red tape." So a big portion of all complaints have originated because of the time required for the service men to put in an acceptable claim. The greatest good that this act can accomplish, in my judgment, is to facilitate the effort of the soldier in presenting his claim and securing prompt action by the bureau.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman stated it takes now 90 days from the date of his application to get his award. How much will it be expedited under this bill?

Mr. LEA of California. I can not state any specific limit. It will be expedited by getting the soldier's application in intelligent form at an early date. When the application is made, if we have the system adopted by this bill, the suboffice will help him to make his application. The delay of sending his application to Washington before a mistake is found will be eliminated. The regional office will make an award, and then it will be referred to Washington, with a right of review, for payment or other relief. It is entirely possible we would save time and other relief. It is entirely possible we would save time and expense if we cut out the power of the regional office to make awards, and left that power vested at Washington solely. In that case the suboffices and regional offices would be purely agencies to facilitate the prompt and proper presentation of the claims of service and ex-service men.

They must have power, however, to make awards on hospital claims, which require immediate action on the ground, and I believe the bill properly confers that authority on the regional and suboffices. I look with apprehension upon a vast system of offices and machinery as a probable source of expense, inharmony of administration, and unbusinesslike methods. I prefer that suboffices be kept to the minimum, and that field agents assist the soldier and investigate his case in his own home and community. In that way, more promptly and at less expense, the soldier's case can receive due attention.

The next source of complaint is on account of disapproval of awards made. The litigant who goes to court and secures an adverse or unsatisfactory judgment is sure to complain. Unquestionably unjust and insufficient awards have been made and just awards have been denounced. That is one of the inherent weaknesses of the system, and must be recognized as a condition that to some degree, unfortunately, will always prevail.

The third of the three great causes of complaints has been due to insufficient and unsatisfactory hospital accommodations. most pressing need of the soldiers is hospitalization and immediate treatment. Delay in the treatment of a disease may have the tendency in the end to make a soldier's condition more distressing and the obligation on the United States greater. There has always been manifested in Congress a hesitancy about a great hospitalization plan. There has been a fear that if we engage in the expenditure of large sums of money for hospitals that will take a long time to complete, eventually, after the hospitals are completed, the peak of the need will have passed, and we will find millions and millions of dollars tied up in hospitals that can not be used. In 1918 the War Risk Insurance Bureau, through the Secretary of the Treasury, presented to Congress a report as to hospital needs for our ex-service men.

At that time it was estimated that within two years there would be a need of 30,650 beds. There were then provisions for 7,200 beds, and the recommendation was made to Congress that to supply 23,400 beds an appropriation of $85,000,000 should be Secretary GLASS in that report stated:

It is not possible for me to state whether or not the estimates as submitted by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service are even approximately correct, but I feel sure that there is an urgent necessity for the enactment of some legislation providing additional hospital and out-patient facilities for the Public Health Service in order to meet the obligations of the Government to patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, I would therefore urge upon you the necessity of an early consideration of these needs by Congress.

Congress proceeded to the consideration of that question, with the result that on the 3d day of March, 1919, an act was passed appropriating something over $9,000,000 for the acquirement of hospitals throughout the country. But the law at that time adopted placed unfortunate limitations on the expenditure of the money and provided that camp hospitals of the Army should be used. These camp hospitals were to a large extent used in the expenditure of that fund. In 1919 the Public Health Service reported in reference to camp hospitals as follows:

reported in reference to camp hospitals as follows:

It was stated many times to Congress during the enactment of the legislation that the service did not believe that eamp base hospitals were suited to its needs, either in point of construction or geographical location. Experience has proven the correctness of these statements. The Public Health Service has taken over these camp base hospitals as directed by Congress, and after earnest efforts to operate them on a satisfactory and economic basis has been compelled to abandon all but two as entirely unsuited to the needs of the situation. Sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines have manifested a strong disinclination to accept treatment at these places, in spite of the effort on the part of the Public Health Service to make them attractive and to adminiser them as civil institutions. As a result it is probable that a considerable number of men are not now accepting hospital treatment and are suffering injury thereby.

Tardily two years later, an the 3d day of March of this year.

Tardily two years later, on the 3d day of March of this year, Congress next appropriated for hospitals. I understand there are now appropriations aggregating about $79,000,000 to provide for hospitals during this and the next fiscal year.

But the situation to-day is this: There are 26,000 men in these hospitals. The net number is increasing at the rate of 1,000 a month. The Surgeon General tells us there are 10,000 men in those hospitals to-day who are in unsatisfactory beds.

We still have a hospital problem. It is going to be here good many years, and a good deal longer than we expected.

ing of new hospitals only as necessity shall require. We also recognize that to meet this great emergency now before us a hospital building program is a necessity that must be entered upon with decisive energy.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, it has now been more than two and a half years since the signing of the armistice, and practically three years have elapsed since the Battle of Chateau-Thierry—the first noted engagement of American troops in the World War, wherein our boys turned the tide of battle, won for themselves immortal renown, and possibly saved the civilization of the world. [Applause.] It checked the advance of the German hordes in their last drive for Paris, and will probably go down in history as the turning point in the greatest conflict the world has ever seen. It was followed by other engagements, in all of which the American soldiers routed the enemy at practically every point, until finally the opposition capitulated and the contest was brought to a victorious conclusion. [Applause.]

Although two and a half years have passed away, and the noble achievements of those boys have grown brighter with each passing month, yet, strange to say, some of those men who were injured in that service have not been adequately cared for.

I can not say that Congress itself has been negligent in looking after these disabled soldiers who were maimed, wounded, or disabled, but I do think there have been delays and possibly neglects on the part of others charged with specific duties relating to the care and treatment of these men, which I believe it is the duty of Congress to look after. I shall therefore support this bill for the relief of these young men, and I sincerely trust that after it has been amended so as to cure its present defects it may speedily become the law of the land. God forbid that America should ever forget or neglect her duty to those brave boys who gave their health, their limbs, or their lives in defense of their country during the dark and perilous hours of war! [Applause.]

The first and most apparent amendment necessary, in my judgment, is to eliminate that portion of the bill providing for the establishment of 14 regional bureaus instead of having one central bureau, and then I would favor creating as many substations as are necessary to do the work required; for, in my humble opinion, increasing these bureaus, or, rather, tearing the one bureau up into 14 branches and scattering them out over the United States, will remove the cases of those boys who are asking for relief from the immediate supervision of Congress and thereby render it much more difficult for the soldier to get prompt relief. So long as these records are here in Washington, where the Congressman can go himself and personally investigate the records, there is far less danger of unnecessary delay than there will be when these records are removed to the 14 corners of the United States. I believe that every Congressman owes a duty to these disabled soldiers, and I am unwilling to vote to remove these records so far from Washington that our efforts in their behalf may thereby be rendered less effective than they are under present conditions.

Let me give you an illustration of how these regional bureaus will hamper us in our earnest efforts to assist these injured boys: I have a meritorious claim, in my opinion, of a soldier who went to France and was badly wounded, and who has been attempting for months to get relief. His case is indeed pitiable, and every effort has been made by the Red Cross, the American Legion, and other benevolent organizations to get his claim adjusted. When I came to Congress they appealed to me to take the case in hand and see what could be done. I wrote several letters to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and received prompt answers telling me what had been done, and from those answers it looks as if he had no right to com-plain. But I discovered that there was some mistake about the number of the claim, and went down to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and spent some time looking the case up; and when I found it I saw that his papers had been filed with the claim of another man of the same name but from a different section of the country, and that the letters we had been receiving relative to what was being done for him were based on the record of another man, and the other man was getting attention while my claimant was being overlooked.

I am also interested in that provision of this measure which relates to the soldiers' insurance. I am in favor of that clause of the bill, but I believe it should be strengthened.

It has been my contention all along that the Government ought to have automatically insured every man for $5,000 or $10,000 during the time he was in the service. I did not think then, nor do I think now, that it was right to take the cost of carrying his insurance out of the soldier's pay, thereby cutting down his meager salary, which was already far, far below the wages then being received by laborers in civil life, many of whom were doing infinitely lighter work than these boys were and at the same time putting in shorter hours. Not only that, but I believe that every one of these men who so desires should have his insurance reinstated; and I am not sure if it would not have been better for all concerned for the Government to have carried every man's insurance for him for three or five years after the termination of his military service. If that had been done, in my opinion, there would not have been all these appeals for adjusted compensation.

There has been some criticism of the educational institutions that are being maintained for the benefit of these injured boys, but I think a great deal of that criticism is unjust. I think a majority of these institutions, and especially those that have been established purposely for the benefit of these disabled soldiers, have done the very best they could under the cir-

comstances

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Earlier in the day the gentleman from Mississippi asked a question as to the kind of education given by the various universities, and so on. I think his question was very pertinent. I have refreshed my mind on the Boland investigation. We had before us Dr. Connelley, former dean of the Carnegie Institute of Technology, at Pittsburgh. He says;

The school in Allegheny is, I consider, one of the best schools, because it has a soul in it, Mr. Chairman. The boys who come to that school are illiterate in their own language. They have undeveloped minds. The war made it possible for them to realize, after giving their service to their country, that there was something for them in life. The colleges of to-day can not train, and will not train, the kind of boys that are being trained at that school, because there is the college atmosphere, the university atmosphere, which is such that unless you have a certain training, a certain preparation, you will not get in with the kind of training necessary to bring you up to where you would want to be as a mechanic or vocational man, due to their curriculum.

Then he goes on to say that if it had not been for this particular institution that the Federal board organized there, taking from the public-school system this man Boland who had charge of all the industrial work in the city of Pittsburgh, these persons could not have been admitted. While I think that there may have been an undue amount in the way of tuition, I do not think the criticism that was made on the floor, brought out by the gentleman's question, was quite justified.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio this question: He has been engaged in college work, has he not?

Mr. FESS. Most of my life.

Mr. RANKIN. About what percentage of students graduate from the high school?

Mr. FESS. Probably less than 7 per cent. Mr. RANKIN. Seven out of every hundred?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Now, in order to enter and to keep pace with students in the average college is it not necessary to be a graduate of a high school?

Mr. FESS. You can not enter a first-grade university without the equivalent of four years in the high school.

Mr. RANKIN. These boys, most of them, want to take up some kind of vocational work, do they not, some form of mechanical work, such as automobile work, electrical work, and so forth, and to receive such training as will enable them to hold down positions of that character? Mr. FESS. That is true.

Mr. RANKIN. That is the point I was trying to bring out in my colloquy with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Robsion] earlier in the day, to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess] has reference.

Mr. FESS. I meant to compliment the gentleman from Mississippi on his question.

Mr. RANKIN. You take these boys who are used to doing manual labor, on the farm or in the factory, practically all of whom are above 21 years of age, and some of whom have not passed the fifth grade in school-

Mr. FESS. And some can not read.

Mr. RANKIN. And some of whom can not read, and put them in the University of Ohio, Texas, Michigan, or Mississippi, and expect them to do effective work along with those students who have had high-school training and other advantages, and instead of conferring a favor on the disabled ex-soldier you often do him an injustice. But if you will take them and put them in these institutions especially established for them and peculiarly fitted to meet their requirements, where they may start off together, under teachers who have their interests at heart, who can sympathize with and lead them along, they will do far better work, and it will be better for all concerned. And I think I speak the sentiments of a vast majority of the ex-service men. [Applause.]
I know there are some people who say that a great many of the claims filed by these boys for compensation are not just, and there may be some that might fall within that class. But who is to be the judge? Certainly not the uninformed individual who makes the criticism and who possibly knows nothing about the case.

It should be remembered by the man who charges improper motives to these unfortunate boys who file their claims for assistance that there has never been an army that was subjected to so many weakening influences upon the human system. In the first place, the training was of the most intensive character, which of itself left the body in such a condition that when the soldier was discharged and ceased to take these violent exercises the physical reaction that necessarily followed often disclosed some weakness developed in the service that rendered him incapable of pursuing his prewar avocation. All of them were vaccinated for smallpox and typhoid fever, and a great many of them were given serums for other similar diseases; and all of these tended to weaken the system in one way Thousands of them had influenza, one of the most insidious maladies that ever crept into the human body, and as a result a great many of them have developed tuberculosis. man never knows to what extent the "flu" has affected him nor how long it will take for the results to develop. And yet some people think that if a man was not disabled at the very moment he was discharged he is not entitled to relief at the hands of the Government, and a degree of proof is often required to substantiate his claim that renders it impossible for him to secure the relief to which he is clearly entitled.

Mr. ARENTZ. Does not the gentleman think that every claimant should be considered as having a just claim rather than being put in the position of being guilty of trying to get something for nothing?

Mr. RANKIN. I think so; or he should, at least, be given the benefit of the doubt. I thank the gentleman from Nevada for the suggestion. I have in mind a case such as he describes, of a woman whose husband died some time ago as a result, as she contends, of injuries sustained or disease contracted while he was in the service. She says he went into the Army a strong man; that the physicians of his community who knew him say that, so far as they know, he had never suffered any disability up to the time of his enlistment. He came home from the Army in February, and during the month of March following two of these physicians were called to see him and they found that he had contracted Bright's disease, from which he finally died, leaving his wife and child without means of support.

ound that he had contracted Bright's disease, from which he mally died, leaving his wife and child without means of upport.

The Bureau of War Risk Insurance informs this woman that he has not furnished sufficient evidence to connect her hus and's death with his service in the Army. He is no longer ere to testify in his own behalf or to furnish the affidavits equired, and the widow, who lives away out in the country, as to go out and get such evidence as she may be able to secure do show that his death resulted from a disease contracted in the of duty. They are trying her case just as if she were a laintiff demanding a judgment and as if she stood charged with he burden of proof to make out her claim by a preponderance of the evidence, if not beyond a reasonable doubt.

I say that in a case of this kind the claimant should be given he benefit of the doubt.

Probably by pursuing this policy the Government might pay claim occasionally that ought not to be recognized, but it would be better to take that chance than it would to run the isk of not doing justice to the family of a man who paid the upreme penalty or to the man himself who suffered a disbility in the service of his country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missishipli has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Jexas.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Garrett]. she has not furnished sufficient evidence to connect her husband's death with his service in the Army. He is no longer here to testify in his own behalf or to furnish the affidavits required, and the widow, who lives away out in the country, has to go out and get such evidence as she may be able to secure to show that his death resulted from a disease contracted in line of duty. They are trying her case just as if she were a plaintiff demanding a judgment and as if she stood charged with the burden of proof to make out her claim by a preponderance of the evidence, if not beyond a reasonable doubt.

the benefit of the doubt.

a claim occasionally that ought not to be recognized, but it would be better to take that chance than it would to run the risk of not doing justice to the family of a man who paid the supreme penalty or to the man himself who suffered a disability in the service of his country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the consideration of the present bill, "To establish in the Treasury Department a veterans' bureau and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau," brings to our minds sacred and hallowed memo-Those of us who were Members of the Sixty-fifth Congress are forcibly reminded of the awful consequences that followed the vote we cast for the passage of the resolution on the 6th day of April, 1917, declaring that a state of war existed between these United States and the Imperial German Government.

The whole-hearted manner in which the American soldier answered the call of his country-his unswerving devotion to duty, the sacrifices he made, whether fighting on some far-flung battle line in Flanders land or enduring the privations and hardships of camp life at home-will give him a place in the military history of the world that will be a marvel to future generations.

Mr. Chairman, now that the war is over-and God forbid that we shall ever look upon the like again-and our soldiers, sailors, and marines having discharged their full duty to their country and their fellow men, it does seem to me that the Congress should hasten to render full service to every disabled exservice man and their dependents by an early passage of this additional helpful legislation.

The bill under consideration, Mr. Chairman, is intended to give prompt relief to ex-service men by cutting out much red tape and consolidating the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the Federal Board for Vocational Training, and the Rehabilitation Division of the Public Health Service into one bureau, which is to be fittingly called the "veterans' bureau."

I shall give this legislation my whole-hearted support, because I think something needs to be done speedily to cut out all the red tape that stands in the way of relief for our ex-service men in receiving promptly just compensation, vocational training, hospital care, rehabilitation, and other relief that Congress intended by former laws they should have without delay.

Our soldiers did not use any red tape to delay their entry into the service of their Government in an hour of p: 1, and the Government should not permit the use of red tape to prevent full and prompt justice being done them in an hour of need.

Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to deliver a speech on this subject at this time, more than to voice my approval of this legislation, and, as one who was denied the privilege of being a soldier, to publicly declare my deep appreciation, and that of my country, for the patriotic services rendered to all mankind by our fearless soldiers, sailors, and marines in the World War.

Having said this in support of the pending bill, I wish, under permission to extend my remarks, to call attention of the House to a telegram recently sent President Harding by Col. Lindsey Blayney, of Houston, Tex., which I believe will be of concern to every ex-service man as well as all other patriotic Americans, protesting against a speech recently delivered by Ambassador Harvey on Pilgrims' Day in London, and an interview in connection therewith as published in an article in the Houston Post of May 23, 1921. The article is as follows:

COL. BLAYNEY IN PROTEST TO HARDING SAYS HARVEY BESMIRCHES AMERICAN FLAG.

"My conscience would never have been clear if I had not sent it. I should have sent it if I had been the only person in the country to feel as I do. If I do say it myself, few people have a greater right than I to protest. I do not protest as a member of either political party, but as an American who lived long in Europe during my student days, long before the world realized the bigness of heart of my native land. How often and how deeply I deplored the misconceptions I heard and read in foreign countries regarding the true idealism of America! We were generally recognized as mere money makers and braggarts—a Nation practically devoid of higher idealism—worshipers solely of the god, almighty dollar, in the temple of Mammon. Through those long years how I longed for the time to come when Europe would finally appreciate the real greatness of heart of America.

"That longed-for and happiest day of my life came at last in France during the war, when I read in a great neutral continental daily in glaring headlines the title, 'The Veritable Idealism of the United States of America!" It was a splendid editorial, showing historically how we had always been an idealistic people, and regretting that our great characteristics of heart and of mind had been misunderstood so long abroad.

"And now one thoughtless testless American nut suddenly in a high." And now one thoughtless testless American nut suddenly in a high."

abroad.

"And now one thoughtless, tactless American, put suddenly in a high position of responsibility in Europe, where he does not belong, destroys at one fell blow—not the League of Nations; I am not thinking of that—but a thing that is vastly more precious to us—the noble edifice of world respect for American humanitarianism and high sense of moral responsibility built by the hands and hearts, and in the hopes and dreams of countless millions of Americans, from pioneer days to the present present.

"My poor protest, even the protest of millions of Americans, can not undo the handiwork of this great American cynic.

"It is inexpressibly regrettable."

Mr. Chairman, in this connection I also wish to place in the RECORD two editorials which recently appeared in the Houston Chronicle, entitled "What's what, according to Harvey," and "Harvey's provincialism"; also two editorials recently appearing in the Houston Post, entitled "Col. Blayney's protest" and "Ambassador Harvey's ungracious speech," and a poem, "Harvey," by Judd Mortimer Lewis, of Houston, Tex.

[From the Houston Chronicle, May 21, 1921.]

WHAT'S WHAT, ACCORDING TO HARVEY.

WHAT'S WHAT, ACCORDING TO HARVEY.

Arthur Brisbane once said that Col. George Harvey had lost all his sense of illusionment up in Meecham, Vt.

That was when the colonel was lambasting Roosevelt and Arthur viewed him as a congenial spirit.

Times change, but not the man who loses his sense of illusionment. The colonel is still at it, lambasting the leadership of those who follow the promise of a broadened vision.

It was all a dream, he assures the English people; America had no ideals in the war but to save herself and serve her own interests.

It is reported that the English people are inclined to speculate on the real meaning of such a message, and well they may.

We shall probably do some speculating ourselves before all the echoes die away.

A war debt of $30,000,000,000, 50,000 young men asleep in France, and quite a number of derelicts to be taken care of—some will say that if we wanted to play safe and further our own interests it might have been done in a cheaper way; and if that is all we have accomplished, the price is far too great.

It is exactly true that we fought to make no nation great at Germany's expense, but it is also exactly true that we fought to make all nations safer.

many's expense, but it is also exactly true that we longift to make an nations safer.

Sir Auckland Geddes said, when he was in Houston, that Germany was defeated and punished, not as a matter of vengeance, but to discourage other nations from pursuing a similar course.

America had some such thought as that in mind.

The talk of making victory the basis for a league of nations was not all bonds.

The talk of making victory the basis for a league of nations was not all bunk.

The thought of proving that no nation could attempt to impose its ambition on the world by force without getting into serious difficulties had quite an influence with the American people.

This country was not aroused by fear of immediate danger.

This country does not feel right now that it is unable to defend itself against a combined Europe.

There was something bigger and better than alarm on its own account that induced this country to enter the war.

Col. Harvey, and those like him, may be able to take advantage of a natural reaction and block the nobler purpose temporarily, but theirs is bound to be a transient influence.

After such voluntary sacrifices in a distant place and for a purpose which loomed far ahead on the heights of altruism it was only logical that the American people should react to a moment of self-centered blues, but the sacrifices and the purpose will presently emerge and be more thoroughly appreciated.

Col. Harvey voices the pessimism of passing fatigue, nothing more.

It is unfortunate that, holding such an important diplomatic position, he should have made such a useless blunder.

It is to be hoped that other peoples will not take it too seriously. It does not represent the basic American attitude at all.

The United States still stands for the sanctity of treaties, for a new international order, for limited armaments, for the rule of justice, and all the other spiritual dynamics which must be applied to world affairs, just as they must be applied to individual affairs, if the race as a whole is to improve.

[From the Houston Chronicle.] HARVEY'S PROVINCIALISM.

We do not know how the British really feel about Col. George Harvey's recent ebullition. They are too polite to make other than complimentary, or cautious, observations.

To us in America, however, and especially after taking time to think it over, it sounds crude, provincial, and countrified.

In the first place, it indicates little concern about international problems.

In the second place, it is not only replete with expressions that eulogize a narrow, selfish, conceited national attitude but contains much superfluous information with regard to domestic politics.

In the third place, it rings with a pessimistic, sneering tone with regard to those aims and motives which, however they may turn out, inspired millions of people to forget themselves for a great sacrifice.

What Col. Harvey really did was first to present his credentials as a good Republican and then expose the most seamy side of American politics.

One wonders if he were using some leftover editorial copy which had been prepared for his defunct weekly, or whether he was merely endeavoring to gain the spotlight by defying every diplomatic tradition.

Certainly there was nothing hopeful, helpful, or reassuring in what he said.

One can not review his cryptic and rather incoherent remarks without gaining the impression that he employed the occasion to give one last sneer at President Wilson.

This might have been allowable for an editor writing in the name of a political clique and to entertain an assorted group of readers, but for the American ambassador to Great Britain it was certainly inappropriate and out of place.

Fortunately, and as we have suggested on more than one occasion, diplomatic representatives do not make the relations between or among countries.

diplomatic representatives do not make the relations between a countries.

Unfortunately, however, they sometimes play an important part in disturbing those relations.

Under present conditions most European nations are willing to swallow anything rather than offend the United States.

We imagine that it made the British public gulp to swallow what Col. Harvey said. It certainly has left us with a choking sensation from Eastport, Me., to Santa Barbara, Calif.

COL. BLAYNEY'S PROTEST.

Col. Blayney, of Rice Institute, undoubtedly voices the sentiment of the great majority of those who served in the great struggle for humanity and civilization when he indignantly protests to the President against the false and sordid statements uttered by Ambassador Harvey in his first speech in London.

Cynics and partisans who remained at home picking flaws with the work of those on the firing line may have possessed so little soul as to behold in the action of America going to the rescue of democratic civilization nothing more than a movement to protect our own selfish interests, but such a view will find small acceptance among those who abandoned every personal interest at home and offered themselves unreservedly for service in the cause.

As a matter of fact, if the motive mentioned by Mr. Harvey had been the only one prompting America's entrance into the war, America would not have gone in when she did, for at that time there was no apprehension in the country that this Nation was in actual danger.

That being the case, the ambassador's statement was a reflection upon every volunteer and every man who willingly answered the draft call, and as a distinguished speaker said in a recent national gathering, if Mr. Harvey spoke truly "tens of thousands of American boys died under false pretenses."

It has been apparent ever since the Republican campaign started that

It has been apparent ever since the Republican campaign started that one of its main objects was to "deflate" the idealism that gripped the people before and during the war. The Harvey speech was in accord with that program outlined long ago by the sordid and selfish interests that schemed for political power, and naturally it is agreeable to at least a part of official Washington. But it will be resented in every circle of the plain people, where service was held up as a badge of honor, and where self-sacrifice was exalted as a personal and national little. virtue.

Despite the combination of political circumstances that put Mr. Harding in the White House, the American people have not repudiated the war, and he and his spiteful ambassador to the Court of St. James will hear more from the people in the future about this gross misrepresentation of their motives.

[From the Houston Post, May 22, 1921.] AMBASSADOR HARVEY'S UNGRACIOUS SPEECH.

Ambassador Harvey's speech before the Pilgrims' Society in London was perhaps a vigorous outline of what is destined to prove the foreign policy of the United States under Mr. Harding's administration, but it was certainly a gratuitous, ungracious, and outrageous misstatement of the policies of this Government during Mr. Wilson's administration.

Mr. Harvey, having never been in any sense a spokesman of President Wilson, or of the Democratic Congress which declared war in response to President Wilson's initiative, and having been at the time war was declared opposed both to Mr. Wilson and the Democratic administration, had no right to interpret their policies or motives. As an interpreter, he should confine himself to the administration of which he is a part.

In declaring that no altruistic consideration urged the United States.

an interpreter, he should confine himself to the administration of which he is a part.

In declaring that no altruistic consideration urged the United States to war, Mr. Harvey speaks with culpable indifference to the facts. Long before the President's address to Congress of April 2, 1917, a deliverance that history will record as the noblest expression of a nation's purpose ever delivered to Congress by an American President, American idealism was at work among the people, and trending to the magnificent culmination of April 6, 1917.

As a matter of fact, the United States did not go to war to save itself. The country was not conscious of any grave peril to its own existence. It realized with a growing indignation, as German ruthlessness increased, how disastrous a German triumph would prove for all mankind, and from the violation of Belgium to the sinking of the Lusitania the President was at times sharply criticized for not taking positive action.

In all the correspondence between this Government and the Imperial German Government, the idealism of this country was emphatically expressed. It was in the ultimatum which admonished Germany that a repetition of its sinking ships without warning would be regarded as an offense for which it would be held to "strict accountability."

And when Germany finally announced its intention to resume its policy of sinking unarmed merchant or passenger ships without warning, the Nation answered with war.

The American ambassador to London is an able man of many admirable characteristics, but it is exceedingly unfortunate, both for him and the Nation, that in his present important office he can not restrain his impulse to vent his personal hatred of Mr. Wilson, not that it injures Mr. Wilson, for it does not. It does, however, injure Ambassador Harvey and places the Nation before the world in a sorry light.

The idealism of the Nation expressed in its emancipation of Cuba, in its refusal to accept a share of the Boxer indemnity from China, in throwing its weight into the Great War for the defense of civilization, in its refusal to participate in indemnities, in its contribution of hundreds of millions to relieve the distress of the war-crushed peoples of Europe—even those of its former antagonists—speaks for itself, and the outstanding facts can never be refuted by an embittered personal enemy of Mr. Wilson, bearing for the time the commission of the Nation to a foreign diplomatic post.

President Harding would not make any mistake by cautioning his ambassador to the Court of St. James to be more prudent of speech in attempting to speak the mind of the United States and to keep his personal hatreds to himself.

HARVEY.

[By Judd Mortimer Lewis, Houston, Tex.]

They died for all humanity, as died the Nazarene; They gave their youth and gave their lives, with all that such things mean;

They gave up years of loving, gave up walks in meadowlands,
Gave up sweethearts with tear-dimmed eyes, gave tender clasping hands,
Gave rose embowered cottages, the patter of wee feet,
Necklacing baby arms, gave all that makes the old world sweet,
That others after them might have these things. For an ideal
They, singing, marched into death's jaws—died on the foeman's steel.

They died for all humanity—gave all they had to give,
That the world's mothers might be safe, that little ones might live
Safe from oppression for all time—and they were glad to die;
Glad to leave blossomed fields for death; to fold their hands and lie
In zinc-lined coffins on the piers of this their native land;
But we, who loved and gave them up, have the right to demand
That while our coffined dead come home where we stand sorrowing
The world shall not be told they died for any selfish thing!

Whence comes the vast assurance that inspires this man to stand Big with his small conceit and so malign his native land?
This pigmy man cast in a mold too narrow and too mean To comprehend their sacrifice, to stand with visage lean Above our dead whose sacrifice achieved its splendid goal, And hold them up for measurement beside his shriveled soul? But the ideals of our dead are ours—we shan't forget!
And Harvey's words make them more grand, and make him smaller yet.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the cold, sordid, unpatriotic reason given by Mr. Harvey for our entry into the World War will find lodgment in the hearts of true Americans—there are those of us who have a broader vision of American ideals. point with pride to the history of our great Nation in her dealings with other nations, and the many unselfish sacrifices our soldiers and citizens have made in the past, of lives and money, in order that other peoples might have guaranteed to them the inalienable right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and enjoy the blessings of a free and independent people.

Mr. Chairman, I also wish to place in the RECORD the following protest of the members of the Herbert D. Dunlavey Post, No. 581, Veterans of Foreign Wars, of Houston, Tex., against the uncalled for and inexcusable remarks of Ambassador Harvey on the cause of our entry into the World War. The article is as follows:

HOUSTON VETERANS DENOUNCE HARVEY'S ADDRESS ON WAR-RESOLUTION WILL BE SENT TO HARDING, UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR, AND WILL BOTHERS.

Members of the Herbert D. Dunlavey Post, No. 581, Veterans of Foreign Wars, at a meeting held at their club rooms Wednesday night, made a complete disclaimer of statements made by American Ambassador Harvey at the Court of St. James, declaring that "having fought in the Great War of civilization on foreign soil and hostile waters, we feel we are in better mind to know the principles for which we fought than this American ambassador, who occupied a swivel chair during that war, within the safe limits of the United States."

HARVEY'S STATEMENT.

The remarks to which these veterans of numerous wars took exception, they stated in their resolution to be as follows:

"Not a few remain convinced that we—America—sent our young men across to save this country—England—France and Italy. This is not a fact. We sent them solely to save the United States of America, and most reluctantly and laggardly at that. We were not too proud to fight—whatever that may mean. We were afraid not to fight. That is the real truth of the matter."

STATE THEIR POSITION.

The resolution says: The resolution says:

"We now declare in unmistakable terms that we fought for the following principles and objects, all of which were well known at the time and none of which we have now forgotten, namely:

"We fought for outraged women.

"We fought for martyred nurses.

"We fought for crucified nuns.

"We fought for innocent civilians, shot down for loyalty to their

"We fought for innocent civilians, shot down for loyalty to their country.

"We fought for little children with hands and arms missing.

"We fought for nameless and numberless mutilated soldiers,

"We fought for innocent thousands upon the bottom of the sea.

"We fought for Belgium, outraged and desecrated as no nation in the previous history of the world has been.

"We fought for France, that nation of heroes, bled white defending civilization against the power of the beast,

"We fought for England, which chose the path of honor, black-tinted with despair, when the little nation she had sworn to defend was set upon by a wild beast,

"We fought for Italy, which took up the cause of right against the power of wrong, terrible though she knew the cost must be.

"We fought for the defense of those principles of human liberty which were laid down nineteen centuries ago by the first great Teacher and Preacher of human rights, the Man of Galilee.

"We fought for democracy against autocracy.

"We fought to banish forever from the face of the earth the hideous greed of Teutonic kaiserism, in order that the world might be made a decent place to live in and that civilization might not perisn.

"All these things we fought for; and we disclaim and resent the efforts of anyone, of whatever party or creed, to belittle our efforts and deeds and to assign to us a selfish and cowardly reason for fighting in our righteous anger and in that wonderful fighting spirit of 1917."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Briggs].

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think this bill is probably one of the most constructive measures that this Congress will enact, because it means the elimination, I hope, in greatest measure of the red tape and difficulties which ex-service men are encountering in securing the relief to which they are entitled. This measure for the first time confers upon one direct head of the several relief agencies control of all branches upon which the proper functioning of this work depends and consolidates such relief in one bureau. Everyone knows in our contact with this subject of compensation, insurance, and vocational education the difficulties that have been and are still encountered, though in justice to all it must be said that there has been a decided improvement in the work of these various relief agencies even under the existing The Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for system. Vocational Education has shown a most marked improvement because of its policy of decentralization, which has enabled it to act directly and finally through regional offices upon the claims of applicants without having to refer the cases to Washington, except in instances where the records of The Adjutant General of the Army had to be consulted for further information regarding the service and condition of an applicant during the war period. In fact, the results and experience of the Vocational Board in decentralizing its activities have shown so marked an improvement over the methods of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance without such decentralization that. the extension of decentralization to all relief agencies, as contemplated in the pending bill, indicates clearly that claimants will have far better and more expeditious action upon their claims.

This measure may not eliminate all difficulties and delays, but it is a long step in the right direction, and should, if rightly interpreted and administered, provide machinery for prompt consideration and final and just action upon the claims of the vast army of disabled veterans of the World War.

I am inclined to think that the powers vested in the director of the veterans' bureau are unnecessarily broad, but the committee reporting this bill, after an extended and careful hearing, having unanimously recommended such authority, so as to give the director the most ample power to organize the bureau in a way that will result in the greatest efficiency and economy, I shall yield to the judgment of the committee, so that there may be no excuse for failure to give the ex-service men and their dependents the consideration and attention which they and their claims deserve.

It may not be amiss in this connection to call attention to just what extent Congress has made provision for the disabled veterans of the World War.

Of course, everyone knows of the enactment of the war risk act during the administration of President Wilson, which for the first time in the history of this Republic made provision for Government aid in the form of allowances which were added to the allotments made by the men in the service for the support and care of their dependents.

The act, moreover, providing compensation payable to both the soldier, sailor, or marine and his dependents in the event of disability or injury sustained by the former by reason of such service. But that was not all which that great law provided. For the first time also in the history of this country, or probably any other country, it insured the life of the soldier, sailor, or marine against all battle risks as well as other risks incident to the service which resulted fatally. Such insurance, which could not be obtained from any regular insurance company on account of the great risk involved, was provided by the Government not only far below actual cost but, under certain circumstances and within a certain limited time, was even granted automatically, without any cost to the service man at all.

In addition to the war risk act, the same Congress passed the vocational act, which provided for the education and training of disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines at Government expense; and where such disability was of a serious character made further provision for payment of so-called "training pay" to cover their support and maintenance while such disabled veterans were taking the course of education provided. This action by the Government was also unprecedented in the history of the United States and was a further recognition of the value of the service performed by the veteran and the obligation of his country to him for his aid.

Since the passage of the original acts referred to, it is further well known that the amount of compensation under the war risk act, as well as the amount of training pay under the vocational act, has been from time to time materially increased, and the scope of the laws considerably extended and liberalized; until to-day the compensation provided under the war risk act ranges, in cases of temporary total disability, as high as $80 a month for single men and $90 a month for married men with no children, on down to such lesser sums as are payable under the act for partial disability. Where the man has children and other dependents an additional amount is allowed, and also where the disability is total and permanent. Under the provisions of the vocational act, training pay ranges as high as from $100 to $120 per month, with additional allowance for dependents; the amount receivable in each case being based upon the severity of the injury or disability of the ex-service man. Under all of these provisions for the care and relief of disabled veterans and their dependents, the Government has already paid out, up to March 31, 1921, over $800,000,000, in addition to over $296,000,000 paid out for allotments.

Such disbursements to March 31, 1921, being as follows:

Operating and administration expenses	$42, 000, 000. 00 276, 011, 027. 00
Compensation Term insurance, actual disbursements	202, 995, 308, 29 198, 405, 907, 95
United States Government life insurance	1, 211, 425, 78 89, 521, 414, 24

810, 145, 083, 26

The above figures do not include all the appropriations which Congress has made for such purposes and which are yet unex-

It may be further stated that wherever it appears that more money is needed Congress is always ready and willing to pro-

The question presented, therefore, is why do not such disabled veterans and their dependents secure aid more promptly and with less red tape and endless and often fruitless effort? The answer is that it is by reason of faulty administration brought about largely through the overwhelming task confronting the war relief agencies, confusion, and mistakes or omissions in the service records, as well as in the lack of coordination of the relief agencies under one head and the inadequacy of the administrative system to meet the demands upon it.

It has not been as much the fault of the war relief agencies as it has been of the system under which they have worked.

The authority was practically divided between these three independent organizations whose functions were closely related, indeed, were interrelated; but with no power in any one of them to exercise final authority over the other. No matter how prompt and efficient one might be in dealing with a case, it could go only so far and no farther; and if the other agency did not pick up the work where the other stopped, the matter was not only apt to be delayed but often misplaced or forgotten.

In my own experience I have often had the same case up with the three separate organizations—the Vocational Board, the Public Health Service, and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance as well as the soldier himself, all at the same time, in an effort get either compensation or vocational training for the disabled veteran, and to get it as quickly as possible.

Time and time again I have been struck with the number of physical examinations required of applicants for relief by both the Vocational Board and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. One bureau or agency would endeavor to show that it was not its fault, but the fault of another agency or bureau upon which it had to depend for the necessary information or action, and would assure you that there was no way by which it could do any more to expedite action upon the claim if the other bureau or agency could not be required to cooperate.

I want to call attention, briefly, to some of the delays and difficulties encountered under the present system.

In the first place, if you secured an examination of a soldier for compensation, such examination would not be accepted as the basis of an award for vocational education. He had to be examined all over again. If he obtained vocational training, but had to discontinue it through ill health, or after completion of training, he had to be examined again by the War Risk Bureau or Public Health Service to determine to what extent he should get compensation. The unfortunate part about it was, and is now, that when these men are given training in class 2 they do not come out of the vocational training with any presumption that their disability, which admitted them to the training, still obtains, but come out very often with the presumption that they have been cured physically because they have been equipped mentally by the education that the Government has given them in the training school. It has often come to my attention that men who came out from under the Vocational Board, drawing $80 or $100 a month, depending upon whether they were single or married, have frequently been given only a 10 per cent compensation rating, getting $8 a month and some-times a little more. They start out with a handicap of being regarded as cured physically because they have been educated mentally, and they have to go through a long experience of delay in the Public Health Service, or did, until such work was actually put under the War Risk Bureau by the recent order of the Secretary of the Treasury, standing examination and reexamination, getting up affidavits again from every source to make out their claim, until to-day the office of a Representative or a Senator of the United States has almost become a law office handling these claims much as any law office in the United States would be required to do. The services of the Congressman are rendered in his official capacity, and of course are without any compensation other than that he receives in his representative capacity as a Representative or a Senator of the United States.

He is only too glad to be able to render the service to those who served their country so valiantly and well, but in behalf of the disabled veteran it can not be but remarked that the growing difficulty of establishing the right to relief by claimants seems often made unnecessarily complex and difficult, and the claimant is too often subjected to rigid requirements of proof which ought not fairly to be expected of him and which he often can not meet, however deserving his case may be.

Let me cite an instance. A soldier in being moved from one camp to another contracted while in the Army a severe cold, which attacked his lungs. He received treatment, and when discharged was given a health rating as good. But the soldier continued to fail slowly, and finally had to give up his job and be sent to Arizona to be treated for tuberculosis. He made application for compensation and filed four affidavits from comrades who knew his condition while in the Army, but he was not able to produce any expert evidence of his condition after his discharge until such time as he wrote to the Army surgeon for a copy of his old prescription to get relief from the disease that was taking his strength away and slowly but surely making a chronic invalid of him. The Army surgeon replied that he could not refill the prescription, but felt sure the United States Public Health Service would probably help him. The man was examined and found to have tuberculosis and unable to work any longer, although he had a wife and four small children, one baby scarcely 2 months old, dependent upon him. soldier must remain in the hospital for treatment while his wife and children are destitute and living on public charity. pensation thus far has been refused by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and it seems doubtful that it will ever be allowed. Yet what jury in the land would doubt that this ex-service man, whose record showed him to be strong and healthy when he entered the Army, contracted his disability while in the service?

The bureau contends the evidence is insufficient to connect up his present condition with any sickness or disease of service origin, although the man himself and his family, the American Legion post, and the examining doctor of the Public Health Service all assert that the complaint is one originating while in the service. The bureau argues that he waited too long to seek relief, but surely the Government ought not to penalize the soldier because he tried to overcome the effects of a disability incurred in the service and finally had to succumb.

Illustrating another case of delay and hardship, it came to my attention, and it is doubtless one instance of many, that a patient waited for six months in a long endless effort to get There was not any denial of the fact that he compensation. was injured, there was no denial that he was entitled to some compensation, but the question seemed to be the extent which he should receive it. In the meantime he had allowed his insurance to lapse. Evidently the Red Cross or somebody had told him that under the law he was not required to take a medical examination; he was entitled to be reinstated on his own certificate that he was in as good health as he was when discharged. The man died about three months afterwards, The War Risk Bureau advised that he had been reinstated. They accepted premiums from the man, but now they are resisting the payment of the insurance on the ground that they do not believe that he was in as good physical condition when reinstated as he was when he was discharged. Of course, there is no way on earth to establish that fact as conclusively as it could be established if they demanded a physical examination by a physician at the time the ex-service man's insurance is reinstated; but the law did not require it in this case. Even then the man had a physical examination by the bureau or Public Health Service in connection with his claim for compensation pending at the time. I say that if the provision that Congress made for reinstatement of the applicant upon his own certificate of good health, where he honestly believed that he was in as good health at the time he is reinstated as he was when he was discharged, is not worth the paper it is written on, it ought to be taken off the statute books and ought not to be allowed to mislead the ex-service men any longer.

I believe the people of the United States generally, and I know the people of my district do, want the disabled ex-service men to get the benefit of a liberal construction of the law. They desire that the act should be liberally construed in favor of the veteran rather than against him; and I am glad to say that in my experience in handling many hundreds of claims for veterans that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance until recently has, in many instances, been inclined to so construe the law.

The tendency now, however, seems to be to demand a greater measure of proof in connecting up the present disability and condition of a soldier with service origin. Of course, if the man suffers from gunshot or bayonet wound with a shattered limb the difficulty is not so great; but where the soldier was gassed in action or suffered disability through disease or sickness the developments from such complaints may be slow in reaching a stage of serious illness, and if the evidence is too exacting for the man to obtain, he must go without relief.

Mr. BOWLING. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BRIGGS. I will.

Mr. BOWLING. I apprehend that the gentleman has given this matter very careful study, but I want to ask if it is contemplated in this bill that through the regional offices and the suboffices investigation and examination shall be made of these applicants and their applications on the ground, or will it have to be done somewhat as has been done before by affidavits filed in the regional office or the suboffice?

Mr. BRIGGS. As I understand it, it will have to be done as it is being done now, with this exception: It will be done through the 14 regional offices instead of directly here with the central bureau in Washington. I understand that you will have to get up the same class of evidence, but the nearer home you bring those officials to the soldier the better able are you to get a prompt and equitable adjustment of the claims of those Very frequently the men, if they are not too far away from these relief agencies, can go there themselves, and if they can not they can make arrangements to send some one there for them, and if not able to do that, then those officials who are located near there have a better knowledge of local conditions, as well as a better knowledge of the men themselves, and can better pass upon their cases. Take an insurance policy to be adjusted. The beneficiary dies before the insured and the latter dies without naming another beneficiary.

The law provides that the insurance shall be regarded as personal property and shall descend according to the laws of the State where the insured resided. That is not always an easy matter to be determined in Washington. It requires an endless amount of red tape and work. Through my office I have had several such cases recently. The amounts were small when apportioned among the heirs. In one case I think there was 70 cents a month apportioned to some children. I know that I have devoted a great deal of technical skill and hard work in connection with those policies of insurance in an effort to have the claims thereunder adjusted. What did the bureau require? It required an application, first, from the boy's father, and there was an endless lot of red tape in connection with that. After several applications had been made out and that appeared settled, they wanted to know all of the nieces and aunts and uncles and brothers and sisters and grandfathers and great grandfathers on either side. After that had been supplied as far as possible, they found that all who were entitled to inherit under the law of the State were the surviving father and the brothers and sisters of the deceased, as the man had left no wife or children. Then after the heirship had been determined, the proceedings had to be started all over again on a brand new application form which every heir must execute and file in the office before any action can be taken. Such delays seem inex-

ity, but the functions of such bureau should be performed with far more efficiency and promptness through the 14 regional offices created by the bill. Each of such offices will have final authority to pass upon every man's claim, and it will not be necessary to have them all come to Washington for final consideration, as must be done now.

In addition to the regional offices there will be created 50 suboffices, which will have the power to investigate and generally aid in the disposition of such claims, except that they will not have the power to make awards. Personally I am inclined to feel that with one so-called suboffice located in each State it would be as well able to make awards as a regional office, and this view seemed to be entertained by the subcommittee framing the bill, though the full committee voted the recommendation down. It may not be possible for all to agree as to the best method of correcting the faults of the present system, but I believe that all the Members of this Congress have deeply at heart the interests of the disabled ex-service men of this country and want to provide them at the earliest time possible with the relief for which Congress has made provision.

The country will never be able to repay these men and their comrades for the sacrifices which they made and the heroism which they displayed. Their fame will grow as the years pass on, and the living, along with the heroic dead, will forever be held in treasured memory by a grateful and devoted country.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, it ought to be the easiest matter in the world for the department to keep tab on all of the correspondence that relates to any particular soldier, whether it is for compensation or insurance or any other right that he may have under the law with respect to his service, because each soldier has a particular serial number, and the very first thing that the department asks for when that soldier either on his own behalf or through some one else writes the department is for his serial number. Yet the records concerning a soldier are not kept together under that serial number. That is one of the reasons that has caused delay more than all others put together. Go down here to this big war risk insurance building and you will find three different sets of files for every single soldier. On one floor you will find a file relating to allotments and allowances with respect to a particular soldier. On another floor you will find an insurance file with respect to that particular soldier, and on another floor compensation, and so on. And his claim is given a number distinct from his serial number. Then down in another bureau you will find his record with respect to his right to rehabilitation, and then concerning all of these rights to get his health report, until recently, you had to go to the Public Health Service in another part of Wash-I am glad that there is to be a consolidation of all of these different bureaus as proposed under this bill, and I do hope that the very first thing the director of the new bureau does will be to consolidate all of the records pertaining to any particular soldier and keep them in one file under his serial number. Then when that soldier's rights concerning any matter to which he is entitled are in question it will not take a clerk more than two minutes to go to that serial number and find out every single bit of correspondence with respect to the soldier.

It is not only true in my district, but in every district you will find soldiers suffering with tuberculosis in the last stages who have not had even a definite reply as yet to communications sent in six months ago. Go down and try to get that letter that you have written in respect to any of these cases. and you find that letter on one floor, or on the next floor, or the next floor, in one of the several files kept. If they would keep this one particular record concerning every single right the soldier has under his service in just one file under his serial number, all of these matters of delay would be avoided.

Then again take a man who entered the service, who was examined by physicians and given a good bill of health, pro-nounced in good condition physically, that he was in such condition that the Army or the Navy would take him into the service, and suppose he went to France, and did service, and came home, and then found himself afflicted with tuberculosis, and gets into a hospital, and makes a claim for compensation. The bureau demands of that man that he make proof, conclusive, by the evidence of persons who were with him in the war that he contracted the disease during his service in the How can they do that?

Their friends and companions, their buddies, who served with them, are scattered over the country; they do not know where they are; they have lost track of them, and it is impossible to get the proof. Are those men to be denied their rights and their compensation? I know of lots of men in the State of Texas to-day from other States in hospitals down there, who have appealed to me for redress here in the departments, whose claims for compensation have been denied, who have furnished the department with certificates of doctors who examined them when they entered the service, showing that they were in first-class physical condition when they entered the service, showing they served in France, and then showing now since they have come home that they are afflicted with tuberculosis, and some of them in the last stages, and yet the department has turned them down on the matter of compensation

Mr. DENISON. What does the department expect these comrades to testify to in respect to the tubercular condition?

Mr. BLANTON. God only knows what they expect. I have taken the position with the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau that any man who can show that he entered the service in good physical condition, that he has been abroad and served his country in France and comes home and finds himself afflicted with tuberculosis, is, ipso facto, entitled to compensation.

Mr. DENISON. I think the gentleman is right with respect to a disease such as tuberculosis. Is the gentleman positive in his statement that the department demands that sort

Mr. BLANTON. I have case after case pending down there where they have demanded that the soldier furnish information from buddies directly on the point that he acquired this disease through his service in France.

Mr. DENISON. I should think that is a pretty difficult

Mr. BLANTON. It is almost impossible to do it, and ought not to be required by this Government,

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I quite agree with the gentleman that that is the view the bureau takes of it

Mr. BLANTON. Well, does the gentleman think it is right? Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Well, I think, so far as the bureau's construction of the law passed by the Congress of the United States is concerned, it is correct; and I think that we ought to be very careful in criticizing a bureau for complying with the law which we passed. For instance, I think, under the terms of this act, it is incumbent upon the soldier to prove that his disability is due to service origin. The mere fact that he served in the Army and that he now is disabled or diseased is not necessarily proof in itself, and I think without some provision in the law that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance would not be justified in holding that all the soldier needs in the way of proof was that he was in the Army and in good health when he left the Army and now is diseased. I should say on the question of tuberculosis, unless in the law we say that when a man shall be found to be suffering from tuberculosis when he was discharged from the Army sound that that therefore should be complete proof, I do not think the Bureau of War Risk Insurance would be justified in saying he is. What should be in the law is another question.

Mr. BLANTON. In the winter of 1917, during the first year of our entry into the war, at Camp Bowie, Tex., and at Camp Travis, Tex., during the month of December I think there were about 4,000 service men in the hospitals at those camps, many of them suffering from pneumonia, if you please, by reason of being exposed to the weather. They did not have sufficient blankets, they did not have sufficient tentage, they did not have sufficient covering against the terrible weather that we had down there that year. They went into the hospitals and they recovered temporarily and were sent to France and they came back. They have developed tuberculosis in the meantime, many of them, and when they show that they were accepted in the Army, that they were then in first-class health, that they did service in France, and they now have tuberculosis, and they swear that it was caused by being exposed to the weather during that service, what more should the department

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman is presenting an entirely different case from what he presented before. The gentleman is now presenting an evidentiary fact which might well lead the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to conclude that service in the war was the occasion for the disease from which he is now suffering. I should think if it were based upon the fact which the gentleman recited it would be sufficient evidentiary fact to lead the bureau to conclude that his war service caused the disease, but the gentleman's first proposition—
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. May I have five additional minutes? Mr. LEA of California. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman's first proposition was a bald proposition that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance ought to find from two evidentiary facts that the soldier was entitled to the benefits of the law. The first evidentiary fact— I will make it as short as possible—is that the soldier was discharged sound. The second fact was that at the present

Mr. BLANTON. I regret I can not yield further.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana (continuing). He was suffering from tuberculosis. I say those two facts are not sufficient under the present law.

Mr. BLANTON. Here are the facts. First that the soldier entered the service sound. He had no tuberculosis in his familythat is, he did not inherit it; that he did service in France; that he came home and has developed tuberculosis since-that is, he finds himself afflicted with tuberculosis. He sends in his own affidavit, which is all he can procure, that he was exposed to the weather during his service, which resulted in his affliction. What more should any bureau require of any ex-service man? Now, I mentioned the hospital conditions in Texas merely to show that there might have been just such conditions in other States with respect to other places where men are now claiming compensation by reason of tuberculosis.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. I just want to ask the gentleman if he does not think it would be well to provide in this law that the claim of the soldier should be liberally construed in his favor, rather than construed against him, and would it not be well to give some latitude to the War Risk Bureau, or to this new veterans' bureau which we are about to create, for this reason? Owing to the lapse of time between their discharge and the development of many of these complaints, ex-service men and their dependents have to go without compensation, although it may be indisputably known by the men themselves and apparent from all the facts and circumstances in the case that the disability is a result of their service.

Mr. SWEET. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to section 300 now existing in the law, which provides as follows: "For death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted in the line of duty by any commissioned officer or enlisted man," compensation is granted.

Now, under section 18 of the bill that we are now considering, section 300 is amended to read:

For death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted in the line of duty on or after April 6, 1917, or for an aggravation of a disability existing prior to examination, acceptance, and enrollment for service, when such aggravation was suffered and contracted in the line of duty.

Mr. BLANTON. I think that is a splendid provision, and I am glad the committee put it in, for this reason: A man might have been threatened with a certain disease which, if he had not entered the service and been subjected to exposure, he would have overcome by reason of his physical condition, and yet by reason of his service it was aggravated to a degree that he could not overcome it. I am glad that provision is in the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana that the records of a man's discharge paper ought not to be taken as evidence against him,

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I can not yield any further.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LEA of California. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will yield me two minutes, will be glad to yield to the gentleman. Mr. LEA of California. I am sorry I can not yield more than

Mr. BLANTON. In conclusion I want to say this, that I think the War Risk Insurance Bureau, where there is any doubt at all, ought to be careful, but they ought not to be so careful that they will become "hard-boiled" toward the soldiers of the country whom we forced into the war in defense of this country. They must resolve every single doubt, where there is any doubt, in favor of the soldier when he makes out a prima facie case. And I think there have been men who have dled in hospitals in the last six months largely by reason of disappointment that has come to them in waiting, waiting, and waiting upon their Gov-ernment, and because of these bureau delays and red tape have lost patience and have not had any more strength to fight the disease afflicting them.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE].

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, under the Federal Board for Vocational Training there are 137 local offices. Under section 6 of the proposed bill this number will be reduced to about 50.

There is no question but what this bill should and will pass the House. It seeks to reorganize the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and part of the Public Health Service, affecting persons who served in the World War by consolidating these three into one bureau known as the veterans' bureau in the Treasury Department. By decentralizing the War Risk Insurance it is thought to serve the soldiers, particularly the disabled ex-service man, more efficiently and quicker. It is desired under this bill to settle, so far as possible, in the presence of the men themselves all questions in which they are primarily concerned.

I desire to direct my attention particularly to section 6 of the bill, which provides for the establishment of a central office in the District of Columbia, not more than 14 regional offices, and such suboffices, not exceeding 50 in number, within the territory of the United States and its outlying possessions. This system is, no doubt, based upon the present system used by the Federal Board for Vocational Training in the Division of Vocational Rehabilitation. Under the Federal board there are now 14 district offices: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Atlanta, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Minneapolis, Denver, San Francisco, Seattle, and Dallas.

So also the United States Public Health Service has 14 offices within the territory of the United States, and I am advised that the National Red Cross also has 14 offices

The idea of this district office is to come as close to the soldier and his needs as possible. Under the Federal Board for Vocational Training there are 137 local offices, while in this bill it is sought to reduce the number of local offices, or as called by this bill suboffices, to not less than 50. The number of these local offices under the Federal board, according to States, is as follows:

4	Nebraska 3
2	Nevada1
2	Montana1
6	New Hampshire1
3	New Jersey 3
3	New Mexico 1
1	New York 9
1	North Carolina1
î	North Dakota 1
3	Ohio5
2	Oklahoma4
5	Oregon2
3	Rhode Island1
2	Pennsylvania8
3	South Carolina 1
3	South Dakota 1
3	Tennessee 3
1	Texas9
3	Utah1
1	Virginia 3
3	Washington 4
4	West Virginia 3
5	Wisconsin 4
1	Wyoming 2
	4 2 2 6 3 8 1 1 1 3 2 5 3 2 3 3 3 1 3 1 3 4 5 1

For example, in Texas there are 9 local offices, in Pennsylvania 8, in New York 9, in California 6. Under this proposed bill it is doubtful if there would be exceeding one office in any of these States. In Ohio, for example, there are 5: Toledo, Cleveland, Columbus, Dayton, and Cincinnati.

Section 6, if enacted, would only permit one, or at most two, offices for the entire State of Ohio. In Indiana, Kentucky, and Ohio there are 11 suboffices, and there are at the present time 6,500 soldiers taking vocational training in these three Statesapproximately 2,500 in Ohio. A consolidation of these five Ohio offices into one, or at most two, offices would mean their supervision of these 2,500 soldiers taking vocational training. I direct your attention to a statement furnished me by Mr. Lamkin, Director of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, showing the service rendered in one of these local offices from March 15 to March 28, 1921, amounting to 394 personal interviews, covering the foll	OWII	ig subjects:

Report on statusLoan	28 20 19	Help with affidavits Dependency claims Home visit for information Change of course Trouble with wife Nurse or doctor for trainee's	98665

Maintenance Copy of discharge Correction of discharge Get out of jail Hurry medical report	Report on family's welfare 1 Get service record 1 Get living quarters 1 Help for cripple 1 Make man pay dependency
Passport to Poland Slacker list	money 2 Total 394

Under the bill the object of these suboffices is as follows:

The suboffices shall have such power as may be delegated to them by the director, except to make compensation on insurance awards and to grant vocational training.

The present duties of the suboffices, as was well explained yesterday by the gentleman from Iowa, are:

The local office in charge of a local supervisor is charged with the responsibility of entering men who are declared eligible into training and giving such men such personal service and help as is necessary and possible, and of getting men who have been trained back into employment at the completion of their training.

The net registration of men whose eligibility for training is being investigated is increasing at the rate of 16,000 per month. The number pending final decision on April 1 was 26,000, less than twice the number of the increase per month.

Ohio stands fourth on the list in the number of soldiers furnished during the recent war, the number being exceeded only by New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois. There are over 200,000 of these veterans within the State. Mr. Lamkin advises me that it would not be possible for one local office, no matter how many employees there would be in that office, to properly care for the soldiers within the State.

The War Risk Insurance under this act is decentralized, but the vocational training and the Public Health Service, instead of being decentralized, will be centralized in event the number of offices in Ohio and other States are reduced.

One of two things must result, either that the soldiers must travel to some centralized point in the State of Ohio and the other large States of the Union to obtain their information, or they will not receive the aid that they otherwise would from these local offices throughout the State.

I therefore recommend for your consideration when paragraph 6 is reached in the bill that that portion of the section limiting the number of suboffices to 50 be amended by increasing the number so as to properly carry on the work now being carried on by the Federal board, so that this bill will carry out the desired purpose of its author and the committee, namely, quick adjustment of claims for all soldiers without delay through local offices. By local offices I mean five for the soldiers of the State of Ohio and a like proportionate number in other States.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman; I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Merritt].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to interfere with the very interesting discussion on the provisions of this bill. At the start I may not seem to speak directly on the question, but I think I can give the committee some information with regard to a service which has already produced many wounded soldiers and which in time of peace is perhaps the most hazardous service either in the Army or Navy. I refer, of course, to the Air Service.

I have been more inclined to bring this information to the attention of the committee in view of the most distressing accident that happened during the past week, causing the death of a number of people and almost causing the death, as you know, of two of the most distinguished Members of this House. The information I shall give has to do with an invention which, if it will do what its inventor thinks it will do, and which two experts who will be quoted here think it will do, will make a great advance in the safety of this service. This invention has to do with giving airplanes what is called initial stability, so if the control is let go they will not side slip, they will not dive, they will not turn over, but they will come right side up, and if they come down they will come down straight. Therefore, with this preface I will read a letter from an inventor who has been devoting years and all his fortune to this service:

BRIDGEPORT, CONN., June 1, 1921.

Hon. Schuyler Merritt, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your request that I send you a copy of Mr. Howell's letter I am embodying it herein:

THE AERONAUTICAL SOCIETY OF AMERICA (INC.), New York, May 10, 1921.

Mr. Christopher J. Lake, Bridgeport, Conn.

Bridgeport, Conn.

Dear Mr. Lake: The deplorable condition of aeronautics and aviation in America brings a blush of shame to anyone having the interests of the further progress in this science and art at heart, and I am taking the extreme liberty of writing you at this time in the hope that some measure may be taken to place aviation on a sane and sensible foundation.

Knowing of your very intensive engineering efforts as applied to aviation, it is my candid opinion that it is about time you came out of your shell and tell about the result of your work.

As your sole effort has been confined very consistently to the production of an airplane with inherent stability, why don't you call attention to the fact that your efforts have simply been to do what was found necessary to be done with the submarine? That is, to so stabilize it as to prevent the so-called accidents that persist with the airplane just as they persisted with the submarine, in which you had so great a part in making stable.

Won't you please understand that my interest in this matter is prompted solely from a desire to see this wonderful art progress in America where, above all other places, it should progress? And if I have been somewhat abrupt in my request I know that you will overlook it in view of the many years of earnest effort I have devoted to promulgating the science of aeronautics and aviation.

Very truly, yours,

THE ARRONAUTICAL SOCIETY OF AMERICA,

THE AERONAUTICAL SOCIETY OF AMERICA, C. W. HOWELL, President.

The Aeronautical Society of America, C. W. Howell, President.

Previous to "confining my efforts to the production of an airplane with inherent stability" I had spent many years of prodigious labors with my son, Simon Lake, in trying out and determining actual, practical, every-minute stability to his submarine boat, which was accomplished day after day and nights regardless of equinoctial storms, on and under rough or smooth waters of the Chesapeake, Hampton Roads, Atlantic Ocean, New York Harbor, Hell Gate, Long Island Sound, and without the loss of a life, boat, or a serious accident. Thus the old unstable submarines were eliminated from diving to destruction with serious loss of lives and the world was given a practical and safe submarine for underwater navigation for all time.

Subsequent thereto I confined my efforts to provide an airplane inherently stable, and with the application of greater power, ways, and means, I succeeded in producing an airplane with every-second stability, which always applies of its own volition unless the operator intervenes and forces his own greater control to dominate, when he becomes the responsible head, as per certification of Mr. Storrs herein given.

Therefore there can be no possible controversy as to the fundamental value of striving for the development of the airplane for war purposes both on land and sea, and there should be no question that the United States should stand idly by and neglect its development for all purposes while other nations are engaged more actively than ever in seeking for its perfection and adaptation to a greater and ever-increasing variety of uses. And its development must specifically include a more stable and safe machine for practical commercial purposes as well if the United States is to hold its proper place in commercial rivalry.

The development of the airplane thus far has been hastened primarily for war purposes, with speed as the primarily include a more stable and safe machine for practical commercial purposes as well if the United accidents to the diving submarines and loss of life, and was one of the principal difficulties to overcome before these boats became successful.

The first device which overcame this instability of submarines was the invention of my son Simon Lake, and was embodied in the Lake submarines after we had spent years of practical experimentation. The Germans were the first to appreciate the importance of these Lake stabilizing inventions, and to adopt them in their own submarines, much to the disadvantage of their enemies. I may say, so that the lay mind may understand, that the war type of the German submarine was of the Lake type, as also were the later type of the United States submarines made by the Lake Co. They descend vertically on an even keel, thus safeguarding the occupants.

I call your attention to the fact that, although in a denser medium, the condition of a submarine in water is substantially the same as an airplane in the air, i. e., they must be both supported in a flexing, varying medium which does not give a rigid support in water or in the air; as, for example, a railway train is supported on its rails, an automobile on the road, but a submerged boat must be supported until it strikes the bottom, or the airplane until it strikes the earth, unless a counteracting means be employed which is termed "stabilization," and which is the crux of their success or failure.

It must, I think, be obvious to any mind, whether trained to aeronautics or not, that for any purpose, assuming that it does not interfere with the use of its principal purpose (and the Lake does not), the stability of an airplane against turning over or diving would be of tremendous advantage.

Briefly, the deplorable condition of aviation is due not so much to the many mistakes of aviators or pilots as to the fact that in its evolution rivalry, exhibition stunting, the fascination for great and greater speed has influenced design to a point where the airplane must be operated by most skillful men, but the most skillful men fall when th explanatory:

"With pleasure I recommend the design and performance of the airplane invented by Christopher J. Lake, and I hereby affirm that I personally tested out said airplane under various conditions and have flown it many times.

"The Lake airplane will rise from the ground or water and fly on an even keel and return thereto by simply varying the speed and without manipulation of controls by the operator, due to its inherent stability. Nevertheless, the operator may at will change and direct the angle of flight with perfect flexibility to ascend or descend within determinable and safe limits, beyond which a machine can not go into a dangerous nose dive, tail spin, plunge, or fall.

"The machine maneuvers easily and beautifully, and is under perfect control of the operator, and without wing warps, ailerons, or other auxiliary or complicating devices for stabilizing. All these features were tested out and performed the work for which they were designed. In all of the experimental tests and flights there was no one injured, and no machine wrecked, which is a remarkable record. "John C. B. Storrs."

The fact that Mr. Storrs learned to fly one of the first Eleriot mono-and no machine wrecked, which is a remarkable record.

"John C. B. Storrs."

The fact that Mr. Storrs learned to fly one of the first Bleriot monoplanes imported into this country, and afterwards constructed and flew three others of similar type, lends weight to his statement.

Millions of people in private and public capacities are groping for a light to show them the goal of the airplane's marvelous promise.

I have groped my way through its dim and uncharted path, on which I entered against warnings and protests, but with a compelling hope beyond my power to resist, just as I now find myself unable to resist the unique appeal of Mr. Howell to "come out of my shell," and which appeal is being supplemented by others—flyers, engineers, and practical men who sense its paramount importance. "Tis said there are ninety-nine wrong ways to one right way, so let us hope the ninety-nine have been proven wrong in order that the right way may now have a chance to reach the public ear.

The extreme exigency of the present situation in aviation demands serious consideration and early action by the Government, which is able to apply the remedy.

The many persons now privately and governmentally connected with the airplane in its various complications overlook or fail to realize—as they did in the submarine parallel—that fundamental changes must be made in the system, types, and construction of the present unstable machines before practical success can be achieved, and you can undoubtedly render a splendid service to the cause of aviation and the advancement of the greatest means of locomotion known to man by presenting the herein-contained facts to Congress.

Thanking you in advance, I am,

Very truly, yours,

Christopher J. Lake.

Now, gentlemen, I have taken the time to read this because

Now, gentlemen, I have taken the time to read this because I want all you gentlemen of influence who are interested in and know that such an invention has been made, when you come in contact with the various services, to make this fact known, so that the services may at least inquire of the inventor and ascertain whether he has what he thinks he has.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I will.

I did not hear the first part of the remarks Mr. DENISON. of the gentleman from Connecticut. Did the gentleman state that this invention has already been used on airplanes

Mr. MERRITT. It has. A machine embodying it has been flown repeatedly, and the results he sets forth have been accomplished and are certified by the last writer whose communication I read, the operator who flew in the machine.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman have any information about it in order to give us some idea of what the nature of the invention is?

Mr. MERRITT. I have not; no; only as to the results. [Applause.]

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Rhodes].

Mr. RHODES, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, before beginning my remarks I first wish to address myself to the colloquy that occurred between the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Sanders] and myself a few minutes ago. Those of you who were present will recall that reference was made by the gentleman from Indiana to the Galbraith letter. I concede that that portion of the Galbraith letter that was read by the gentleman from Indiana, as stated by him, did not correctly state the facts. Therefore, the gentleman was fully justified in making the statement that he made.

But I also wish to say that there is another part of the Galbraith letter to which I had reference when I challenged the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, which I still insist is correct. So, in concluding upon the proposition, let me say that the gentleman was correct in what he said and I was correct in what I said, because he referred to one part of the letter and I happened to refer to another part.

But, however that may be, I know this House is in earnest in wanting to do something to promote the welfare of the returned soldier. I have made it my business to carefully examine every paragraph and every sentence in this bill, and I listened with unusual interest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Sweet] on yesterday, when he so ably, so earnestly, and so thoroughly explained the purposes of the measure. And I want to say here and now that I shall cheerfully support the bill.

But there are a few things about this bill to which I wish to call attention. It is my chief purpose at this time to give notice to the House that when the bill is reached under the 5-minute rule I shall offer an amendment to section 404. I wish to refer now to the situation that was developed in the course of some questions that I asked the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Sweet] I stated to him a hypothetical case, based upon this state of facts: In my district a boy who did overseas service was honorably discharged. At the expiration of four months from that time he died. At the time of his discharge he had in effect $10,000 insurance, but it so happened in this case, as in many others, that this boy did not continue to pay his insurance premiums. Therefore at the time of his death he was in arrears for four months' premiums, in the aggregate sum of about $28. The further fact is that there was due this boy the $60 bonus. That $60 was never paid, and at the time of his death the Government of the United States owed the boy more money than the boy owed the Government on account of his failure to pay the insurance premiums.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Newton] volunteered the suggestion, when I stated the proposition to the gentleman from Iowa yesterday, that under existing law the beneficiary under that insurance policy, who was the deceased soldier's father, was not entitled to the insurance for the reason that the $60 bonus was in the nature of a gratuity, contending it was the boy's individual property, and therefore under existing law it could not be legally applied toward the discharge of the premium.

In that statement, Mr. Chairman, I concur, and that is the exact situation about which I am complaining. But I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota and of the gentleman from Iowa to this further fact: I was not satisfied with that explanation, which I concede was a correct statement of the law, and so this morning I called up the legal department of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and was informed that prior to September 14, 1920, under the construction and application of sections 402, 403, and 404, of the war risk insurance act, they did apply in such cases bonus money toward the discharge of unpaid premiums.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, if it was right prior to the rendering of that decision by the Comptroller of the Treasury, prior to September 14, 1920, the same principle should be applied to-day. And as a further justification for my contention that the law should be amended so as to meet this exceptional situation, I want to say to the gentleman in charge of the bill that I was informed this morning that only about 60 cases in all the United States have arisen of this character. Therefore I say, gentlemen, as a matter of equity, as a matter of good conscience, as a matter of right, and as a matter of patriotic duty, it is your duty and mine to see to it now and before this bill shall have been enacted into law that we liberalize this section of the act in order that it may meet this extraordinary and meritorious class of

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentle-

Mr. RHODES.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In the case the gentleman has in mind, did the soldier write to the bureau or to the Government and ask them to apply the bonus in payment of the premium?

Mr. RHODES. I am not advised as to that, and that would be immaterial, because I assume in the soldier's application for insurance he stated whether or not he wanted his money to be applied toward the discharge of his premiums.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It seems to me that that would be very material. That is my judgment.

Mr. RHODES. I will yield to the gentleman sufficient time to state the materiality of that proposition.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If the soldier asked the Government to apply the money which the Government was owing to him in payment of insurance premiums, the Government ought to pay it, or they could go to court and compel it to pay.
Mr. RHODES. The Government was bound only up

The Government was bound only upon what was contained in the application, and subsequent requests could not modify the contract of insurance.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Oh, but the written order of the soldier to apply the debt to the payment of the premium certainly would make it a legal obligation.

Mr. RHODES. Does the gentleman mean to say that under the law upon such a request, either verbal or in writing, that the insurance contract would have been modified to the extent that the bonus could have been applied?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri

has expired

Mr. RHODES. Would the gentleman from Massachusetts yield me two minutes more? Mr. WINSLOW. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I mean to say this, that the Government is the insuring party, and the Government having the money in its possession belonging to the insured, if the insured asked to have that obligation transferred and applied to the premiums, the Government would be held.

Mr. RHODES. Very well. I want to say this in conclusion. that regardless of what the cold, legal facts may be, and with all due regard to the opinion of my distinguished friend from Minnesota, I again repeat that in equity and in good conscience it is the duty of the Congress to see that in all cases where the Government owes the soldier more money than the soldier owes the Government, that such money, whether it be the $60 bonus or money arising from pay, or any other source, the same should be applied toward the discharge of the premium.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RHODES. I will, if it is not too long.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This soldier had the right to let the insurance lapse if he wanted to. That is to say, he could say, "I do not need the insurance any longer," or something of that kind.

Mr. RHODES. Yes; and the Government ought to have the right to apply the bonus due the soldier to the discharge of the insurance premiums.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. But if we gave him the right to let his insurance lapse, is it right for the Government to say, "This is $60 in fee simple that we give him and yet we are going to use that and make him keep up the insurance"?

Mr. RHODES. That is rather a technical question.

Mr. CANNON. Uncle Sam had the $60.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Uncle Sam had the $60 and the soldier was entitled to it.

Mr. RHODES. I can not yield further. I want to call attention to the inconsistency of the facts upon which the comptroller based his opinion of September 14, 1920, and the case I cite. He cites a case in which the bonus money was paid the soldier after the insurance had lapsed, and upon that ground held that the Government was not bound. In the case I cite it was never paid. The department says there are about 60 known cases in the United States in which the bonus money was never paid, and that between February 24, 1919, the effective date of the bonus act, and September 14, 1920, the date of the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, the bonus money was so applied.

In how many of the 60 cases that the gentleman speaks of had the soldiers allowed their policies to lapse?

Mr. RHODES. In all of them, as I understood it.
Mr. SWEET. And those are the only cases reported to the gentleman? Mr. RHODES. Those are the only cases similar to the case that I have submitted to the department. I say in all such cases the soldier should be given the benefit of the most liberal construction of the war risk insurance laws.

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from

South Dakota [Mr. Johnson]. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, any member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce or Member of this body, or person connected with an executive department of the Government, or any other individual who has ever had anything to do either with the preparation or the passage of the bill H. R. 6611, ought to receive the thanks of every exservice man. I do not rise so much to discuss the merits of the bili-because the measure speaks for itself-as to try to give all the credit I can to the Members of this body and others who have really worked for the ex-service man and have given him, in my opinion, the best measure that has passed the House since the beginning of the late war with Germany. you have read the papers in the last few months you will find that many men are already beginning to claim credit for this measure, credit that is due to the members of the executive departments, beginning with the present President of the United States and ending with the Members of Congress and the committee who drew this bill.

This measure has been before the House in many ways for It was under consideration for months by the executive committee and the legislative committee of the American Legion. Few other measures have had the cooperation of the Executive, the legislative, and the soldiers' organizations as this has had. I think it speaks well for the future of the United States when we see the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States working together in the harmony that ought to exist between that man and those bodies. Much credit belongs to the President for his insistence in seeing that we secure legislation of this sort. All the initiative did not come from him. I know that the rules of this body provide that no man shall discuss that which has occurred in a committee, and I shall not attempt to do so, but there is nothing to prevent me or any other man, even if he is a Member of Congress, from giving the facts with which he is acquainted with reference to legislation.

I want to say that this bill was prepared in large part during the last Congress, and much of the credit for that belongs to the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, to the President of the United States, before he assumed that office, and to the commander of the American Legion, F. W. Galbraith. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Mr. Winslow; his predecessor, Hon. John J. Esch, of Wisconsin; the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Burton E. Sweet; the distinguished gentleman from Texas, Mr. Sam Rayburn, met with the commander of the American Legion and others who were interested in securing this kind of legislation and prepared the outline of it, together with other members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and other Members of this House, so that it could be brought before this body and so that when it comes up for passage tomorrow or Monday it can receive the unanimous vote of the House. It will be the only legislation of its kind that has been brought before the House for some time that every man will favor in every essential particular. I am going to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting the names of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce who have given such wonderful service to the ex-service men and at the same time have protected the Government in every possible way. And I want to say that as one service man, expressing the opinion of many others, every man who might possibly be affected by this bill will remember the work that was done by this committee of the House. [Applause.] The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record.

there objection?

There was no objection.

Jared Y. Sanders, Louisiana.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, it is my desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Burke] if he is present. He does not seem to be. I also wish to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. London] if he is present. He does not seem to be. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER], but he is not present. yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROSSDALE

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I rise in support of this measure to establish a veterans' bureau. It fills a long-felt want and is of urgent necessity. bers of this House are familiar with the conditions that surround those ex-soldiers whose necessities compel them to do business with the War Risk Insurance Bureau and the Public Health Service of the Treasury Department. We have all had first-hand experience with these cases, and I believe that this bill gives us the much-needed remedial legislation that will do away with and avoid the present intolerable conditions.

It is for us to take care of and to provide for the living-for those who in the war were maimed, injured, or incapacitated. The memory of those who served and who made the supreme sacrifice in the World War will be kept bright and fresh forevermore by the people. But it is the duty of this Congress, which duty I am glad this Congress is performing, to provide the legislation that will give our soldier boys the requisite departmental conditions that they require; that will give them the benefits of hospitalization where they need it, and provides for the coordination of bureaus to prevent overlapping, and which will avoid the immense amount of governmental red tape and confusion which resulted from the conflict of various bureaus in charge.

In The Bronx and all over the country there are thousands of ex-soldiers who are constantly applying to the local War Risk Insurance Bureau, and who are subjected to delays and in-consistencies of departmental rulings, which create conditions of almost unbelievable trouble and annoyance. I might state in that connection the case of a neighbor of mine who went to France, served throughout the war, was gassed severely, came back, and contracted tuberculosis. There was no one in all the different bureaus that said the man was not entitled to compensation for hospital maintenance; indeed, warrants had been drawn by different officials in the Public Health Service, and he had been shifted from one hospital to another. He is now out in Arizona, and through the charity of the proprietors of a sanitarium in that city, to which the boy had run away from unspeakable conditions at another hospital, he was kept seven months, and the payment for hospital care to which the boy was entitled had been withheld from him, not because anyone or any department disputed the fact that he was entitled to it, but because they did not get three bureaus that had jurisdiction to work together. This bill, I am happy to say, will remedy any such conditions and prevent their recurrence.

In my district on last Saturday we dedicated 946 tablets to the memory of the soldier boys of The Bronx who made the supreme sacrifice in the World War, and I request, Mr. Chairman, that I may have unanimous consent to include in the RECORD the names of these 946 boys, the names of The Bronx list, who died for our country, and also to extend my remarks in connection therewith.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I understand the request is to print the names of a large number of soldiers from a certain section who lost their lives in the war.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Who made the supreme sacrifice in the World War.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, that presents a very delicate matter to make an objection to, but I will leave it to the judgment of my friend who makes the request as to whether or not he will insist upon it. There were about a hundred thousand who lost their lives in the war, and it might seem a discrimination that the names of some should be printed in the Record and not the others. I believe, on reflection, my friend will see the unwisdom of pressing that request.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Ordinarily there would be, but I would like to call attention to the fact that in my city there occurred a touching and unusual scene in connection with this dedication. Along that great highway the Grand Boulevard and Concourse, where the trees are planted for miles, tablets have been set on which were placed the individual names of each one of these boys, with appropriate ceremony, by the American Legion. These tableted trees were given over to the loving care and remembrance of the people of our city.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is true also of Sixteenth Street in this city. I hope the gentleman will not make that request. It seems to me that it is a discrimination to take a few names and publish them.

Mr. ROSSDALE. If the gentleman wishes me to withdraw the request to publish these names I will do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws

Mr. ROSSDALE. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, not including the names.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that request?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I have listened with very great interest to the remarks upon this bill from both sides of the House, and especially to the very clear and very comprehensive and entirely convincing summary of the present conditions from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], the author of this bill. There is no question but that in this House we are all for the bill. The only possible question is on the working out of the details which will give the best possible administration. We have all realized the delays which have been caused, not by any intention on the part of this country, not by any intention on the part of the administra-tion, but entirely because of the uncoordinated facilities for doing the work in which we all believe. There has been considerable discussion on section 6 in reference to the number of bureaus but that matter will be taken up more fully under the five-minute rule, and I shall not make any remarks on that at the present

My purpose in speaking on this bill is to say to the House that it is the sort of a bill in which there is an entire unanimity of opinion. The last war brought a certain new element back to this country, and as I have listened here in this House to the discussion of the elements of this bill I have been reminded of that verse which so wonderfully typifies the reborn America as it emerged from the last great struggle. If I recollect it correctly, it is this:

Here's to the Blue of the wind-swept North
When we meet on the fields of France.
May the spirit of Grant be with them
When the sons of the North advance.
Here's to the Gray of the sun-kissed South
When we meet on the fields of France.
May the spirit of Lee be with them
When the sons of the South advance.
And here's to the Blue and the Gray as one
When we meet on the fields of France.
May the spirit of God be with them
When the sons of the Flag advance.

[Applause.]

I think one of the most wonderful things I have seen in this Congress is the expression of that feeling in this country, reuniting all the sons of the flag, whether they come from the land of the blue or the land of the gray, as they fought for this Nation in this last war. [Applause.]

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I do not see the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish] in the Chamber, to whom I promised to yield 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts or the gentleman from Kentucky desire to yield further? If not, the Clerk will read

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.-

TITLE I .- VETERANS' BUREAU.

SECTION 1. There is hereby established in the Treasury Department bureau to be known as the veterans' bureau, the director of which hall be an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in addition to those therwise provided by law, and shall receive a salary at the rate of 10 000 per annum shall be an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in addition to those otherwise provided by law, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum.

The word "director," as hereinafter used in this act, shall mean the director of the veterans' bureau.

The powers and duties pertaining to the office of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance are hereby transferred to the director of the veterans' bureau and the office of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby abolished.

There shall be included on the technical and administrative staff of the director such staff officers, experts, and assistants as the director shall prescribe; that there shall be in the veterans' bureau such sections and subdivisions thereof as the director shall prescribe.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Anderson, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 6611, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. MILLS was granted leave of absence, for two days, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made to-day on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6567. An act to amend section 407 of the transportation act of 1920.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 1837. An act to amend section 32 of an act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

S. 1911. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS ON MONDAY.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, may I submit a parliamentary inquiry? Under the order for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6611, I presume there is no question as to the order of business on Monday, which is suspension and unanimousconsent day, and that will be the order of business notwithstanding the order made in reference to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.
Mr. WINSLOW. That means that this bill will be considered further on Tuesday. The SPEAKER. The SPEAKER. Unless the unanimous-consent business should be completed on Monday. If it is completed, then this bill would be in order. The Chair has not examined the calendar, but understands there is a considerable amount of business on the calendar.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, June 6, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. BOIES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6648) authorizing the appointment of an additional judge for the district of Minnesota, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 135), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.
